

Wonder Wall.

A New Elephant Mural Is Just The First Of Many New Art Projects Coming To Deep Ellum's Walls.

The sun high above him — and only getting higher as noon approaches quickly -- Adrian Torres wipes some sweat from his brow and points along the ground toward the increasingly smaller sliver of shade that this wall on the easternmost edge of Deep Ellum affords him.

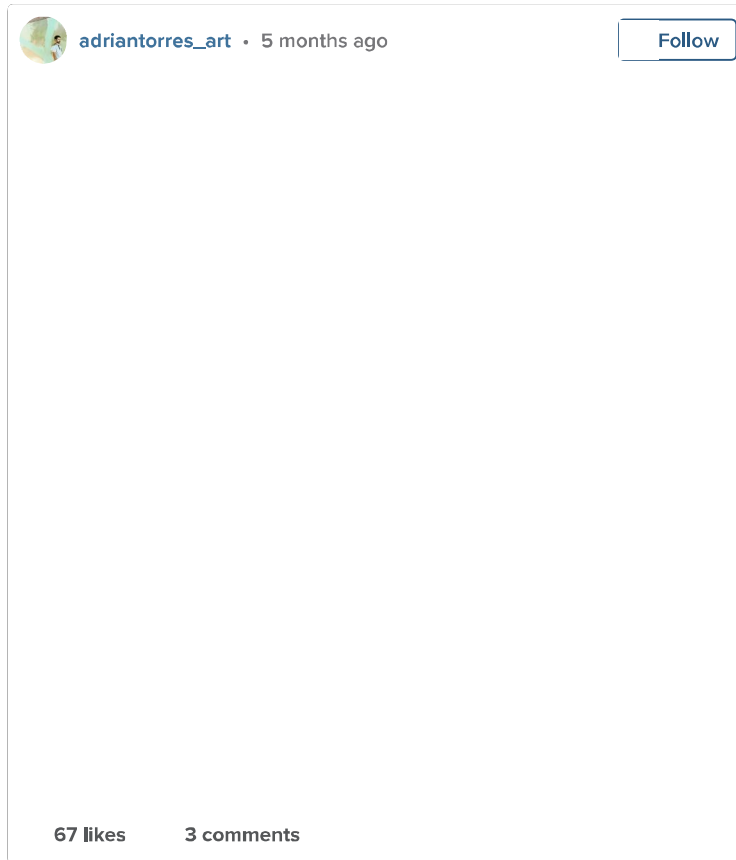

"The later it gets," he says through a smile, but a little frustrated just the same, "the less shade I have."

It's an offhand observation, but a telling one: Torres has become intimately familiar of late with the grounds of the vacant Brake & Clutch Service building at the intersection of Main Street and Exposition Avenue; for more than a week, and right up until this past Sunday when his time there came to an end, that building's westernmost wall served as his 6:30 a.m. to noon home base every day. The shadow is this Spanish painter's only respite from Texas' July heat as well as the time-keeper for his attack upon the wall providing it.

His is a benevolent maneuver, but a hurdle just the same: "I'm a painter," Torres explains. "I do fine art. I don't really do graffiti, and this is the biggest-sized canvas I've ever done."

The size is what dictated his efforts here. Stretching across Torres' wall is a stunning parade of 12 elephants – a total he has to count to confirm – that would look more at home on as part of water-colored canvas than on a Deep Ellum wall. And yet it's that exact dichotomy that makes this presentation so visually striking.

Torres came to this wall and project after already being scheduled to be in Dallas this month for other work opportunities (he also operates a non-profit called Riding Colors that aims to help the needy across the globe through artistic endeavors). Upon hearing this news, a local artist with whom Torres had previously collaborated in the Philippines – Lesli Marshall, also a painter – suggested he tackle this blank wall while in town, too.

The motivation behind the effort is to better draw attention to its properties' natural assets, all the while winning some neighborhood beautification points and, y'know, maybe attracted along the way. If Torres' pleasing direction - which stands in stark contrast to Ellum's rougher (in spirit and design) wall pieces - is any indication of the neighborhood's evolving aesthetic, these walls - everything, he says, "from perspective to portraiture."

"We don't want to limit it to a style," he continues. "We're just providing the canvas and the artists are providing the art."

"There's going to be variety," adds Marshall, who's helping helm the vetting process for artist applications for the project's many available walls. The project's 42 approved artists will each receive a flat stipend to cover their efforts and expenses.

The goal, Rohrman and Marshall agree, is to enhance the neighborhood's visual presentation without alienating it. Look around Deep Ellum and you'll see murals at most every turn; the neighborhood is already known as a Dallas mural hub. Still, adding 42 new designs to the mix is a substantial increase.

"We're trying to listen to the community," Rohrman says.

No doubt, if Deep Ellum as a neighborhood has made anything clear over the years, it's that it approves well of colorful wall art. 42 Murals, it seems, is intent on take that pushing that vibrant narrative forward.

Torres' scene - it's unnamed, may we propose "Ellumphants" as a possibility? - may have quietly arrived on the scene. But, representing twelve elephants' worth of steps in that new direction, it would seem the piece also signals an impending art stampede.
