Globalisation: what people think

Big business has become more globalised over recent decades, expanding into new territories, buying up local companies and, as a result, has increased trade and cultural exchange around the world. But globalisation is starting to face some resistance. Through a resurgence in populist political movements, a rise of economic nationalism and ongoing challenges with immigration, public opinion has shifted, and is set to disrupt the ideology that a globalised world is a force for good. Using a recent survey from YouGov of more than 20,000 people across 19 countries, this infographic explores how globalisation is viewed around the world and the possible reasons for these differing attitudes.
