AMERICAN CONSERVATORY THEATER, San Francisco’s Tony Award–winning nonprofit theater, nurtures the art of live theater through dynamic productions, intensive actor training, and an ongoing engagement with our community. Under the leadership of Artistic Director Carey Perloff and Executive Director Ellen Richard, we embrace our responsibility to conserve, renew, and reinvent our relationship to the rich theatrical traditions and literatures that are our collective legacy, while exploring new artistic forms and new communities. A commitment to the highest standards informs every aspect of our creative work. Founded by pioneer of the regional theater movement William Ball, A.C.T. opened its first San Francisco season in 1967. Since then, we’ve performed more than 320 productions to a combined audience of more than seven million people. We reach more than 250,000 people through our productions and programs every year.

The beautiful, historic Geary Theater—rising from the rubble of the catastrophic earthquake and fires of 1906 and immediately hailed as the “perfect playhouse”—has been our home since the beginning. When the 1989 Loma Prieta earthquake ripped a gaping hole in the ceiling, destroying the proscenium arch and dumping tons of debris on the first six rows of orchestra seats, the San Francisco community rallied together to raise a record-breaking $30 million to rebuild it. The theater reopened in 1996 with a production of The Tempest directed by Perloff, who took over after A.C.T.’s second artistic director, gentleman artist Ed Hastings, retired in 1992.

Perloff’s 20-season tenure has been marked by groundbreaking productions of classical works and new translations creatively colliding with exceptional contemporary theater; crossdisciplinary performances and international collaborations; the reintroduction of a core acting company; and “locavore” theater—theater made by, for, and about the San Francisco area. Her fierce commitment to audience engagement ushered in a new era of InterACT events and dramaturgical publications, inviting everyone to explore what goes on behind the scenes.

Perloff also put A.C.T.’s conservatory and educational programs at the center of our work. A.C.T.’s 45-year-old conservatory, led by Conservatory Director Melissa Smith, serves 3,000 students every year. Our three-year, fully accredited Master of Fine Arts Program has moved to the forefront of America’s actor training programs. Our M.F.A. Program students often grace our mainstage and perform around the Bay Area as alumni. Other programs include the world-famous Young Conservatory for students ages 8 to 19; Studio A.C.T. for adults; and the Summer Training Congress, an intensive program that attracts enthusiasts from around the world.

A.C.T. also brings the benefits of theater-based arts education to more than 8,000 Bay Area school students each year. Central to our ACTsmart education programs, run by Director of Education Elizabeth Brodersen, is the longstanding Student Matinee (SMAT) program, which since 1968 has brought tens of thousands of young people to A.C.T. performances. We also provide touring Will on Wheels Shakespeare productions, teaching artist residencies, in-school workshops, and in-depth study materials to Bay Area schools and after-school programs.

With our increased presence in the Central Market neighborhood marked by the opening of The Costume Shop theater and the current renovation of The Strand Theater across from UN Plaza, A.C.T. is poised to continue its leadership role in securing the future of theater for San Francisco and the nation.

Dear Friends,

Every once in a while in my job as artistic director, I walk into a rehearsal room and hear something truly magical—something unlike anything I have experienced before. Such was the case at the 2010 Sundance Institute Theatre Lab when I heard Aaron Jafferis and Byron Au Yong’s Stuck Elevator for the first time.

Going in, I had no idea what to expect—how do you make a musical out of the heartbreaking tale of a Chinese deliveryman who gets stuck between floors in the elevator of a Bronx apartment building for 81 hours? What I discovered was the incredible power of the artistic imagination to take a piece torn from real life and turn it into a hugely complex, entertaining, and moving piece of theater. Aaron, Byron, and their inimitable director, Chay Yew, went deep inside their hero Guang’s mind to discover what lay hidden there: his fantasies about his home in China and his longing for the wife and son he had left behind; his competitive collisions with his fellow deliveryman, Marco, and the boss who torments him; his fear of being trapped. All of these thoughts and feelings became characters and songs in this extraordinary new musical.

Stuck Elevator is a tribute to the ferocity of the human spirit in the face of endless disappointment, and to the lure of America as a potentially better place, in spite of the huge obstacles that immigrants face when coming here. It has been thrilling to watch this beautiful company shape this material, and we offer it up in salute to the many remarkable Chinese and Chinese Americans who make the Bay Area their home, led by our mayor, Ed Lee.

Meanwhile, our beloved Geary will continue to embrace vivid theatricality and language of scope. With that in mind, we have chosen productions for A.C.T.’s 2013–14 season that are filled with big dreams, big conflict, and big journeys. It is a season of international exchange and a season of American politics. It is a season that explores the longing of parents to secure a better life for their children, and the outrageous things that happen when money and war drive decision-making. And it is a season filled with some of A.C.T.’s favorite actors. Here is a quick summary of some of what is in store for you:

We are delighted to open with Frank Galati’s remarkable interpretation of one of the best and most iconic musicals ever penned about American politics, 1776. I had the good fortune to see this production at the Asolo Repertory Theatre in Florida a few weeks after last November’s presidential election and just before seeing Spielberg’s Lincoln. The brilliant way in which 1776 weaves a complex and suspenseful tale about the beginning of our democracy resonated so powerfully with our own deeply divided Congress and with the thrilling and difficult political navigations of Lincoln’s quest to ratify the Thirteenth Amendment. Galati has a wonderful gift for making every moment and every character matter, no matter how small, and I was so captivated by his humane and lively vision that I asked him to bring it to San Francisco. It will be an honor to welcome this legendary director to A.C.T. with a production that will fascinate the entire family.

Since his beautiful performance in Scorched, I have been working with beloved A.C.T. favorite David Strathairn on finding the perfect project to bring him back. It was A.C.T. Artistic Associate and Stuck Elevator dramaturg Beatrice Basso who thought of Underneath the Lintel, a riveting ghost story by Glen Berger about a librarian whose discovery of a library book that is overdue by more than a century sends him on a quest around the world that eventually leads him straight back to his own identity. Lintel is a magical piece of storytelling that, in the hands of a consummate actor like Strathairn, will leave you breathless and transported.

By now it has become a running joke in the A.C.T. offices about how much I love Canadians, but I am so happy to report that the love affair continues with our next big international exchange, a collaboration with Theatre Calgary on one of Shaw’s greatest plays about women, war, and money: Major Barbara. This idea began brewing in the summer of 2010 when Theatre Calgary invited A.C.T.’s Tosca Cafe to open their season, and indeed the lead in our Canadian version of Tosca, Dean Paul Gibson, will play Undershaft in Major Barbara. Featuring a mix of Canadians and Americans and directed by Theatre Calgary’s artistic director, Dennis Garnhum, this is a rare example of how international dialogue can become an incredibly fruitful annual event.

If we had to list actors who are dearest to our hearts, A.C.T. Associate Artist Marco Barricelli would certainly be central to that list; and when we read Beatrice Basso and Linda Alper’s brilliant version of Italian playwright Eduardo De Filippo’s Napoli Milionaria, we knew we had found the perfect vehicle for Marco. This is a deeply moving and richly humorous play about a Neapolitan family that descends into black marketeering in order to survive during World War II. Like Brecht’s Mother Courage, Napoli! follows a resourceful mother, Amalia (who will be played by Phèdre’s incomparable Seana McKenna), who desperately tries to keep her family together while the world around her is falling apart. This is A.C.T.’s salute to the Year of Italian Culture in the United States—and to San Francisco’s rich Italian heritage. (And it will show you how to stockpile coffee in your mattress for the lean years ahead.)

So much discovery has already happened in and around Stuck Elevator that we were anxious to continue our exploration of Chinese theater, and what better way to do that than to go back to the most enduring Chinese epic of all, The Orphan of Zhao, a remarkable tale from the fourth century BCE that has been dubbed “the Chinese Hamlet.” Telling the story of a humble Chinese doctor—portrayed in our production by the inimitable Bay Area native BD Wong—who sacrifices his own son to keep alive the only surviving member of the decimated Zhao clan, Zhao is at once both personal and vast. Filled with suspense, sorrow, court intrigue, and compassion, Zhao provides a window into China that feels as vivid as when it was first written.

And because no season is complete without a dose of sizzling sex, we will bring you David Ives’s Venus in Fur, one of the hottest tickets in New York last season and a wildly theatrical take on how far one actress will go to inhabit a role. We invite you to unlock the mysteries of this cat-and-mouse thriller.

One more title will follow shortly, but we couldn’t wait to share this much with you and give you a taste of what’s in store for you in this magnificent space as we continue to push the boundaries, travel the globe, and create theater for the Bay Area that is both immediate and surprising.

And before I let you go: I have just finished casting Arcadia and I am bursting with excitement at the opportunity to revisit this most luscious, heartfelt, and romantic of Stoppard’s plays with a remarkable company and design team. At the same time, we are taking over The Drill Court at the Armory Community Center in the Mission for the incomparable Black Watch and The Regency for our spectacular Season Gala.

It will be an inspirational spring at A.C.T. We hope you’ll be there to share it all with us!

All my thanks,

Carey Perloff

The Story of Stuck Elevator

Song “Holla”
Guang hurries into a Bronx elevator after making a delivery. Tonight he can finally close one of his debts. The elevator plunges and grinds to a halt between the third and fourth floors.

7:00 p.m. Five minutes later.
Song 門沒有開 “Men Meiyou Kai” ("Doors Don't Open")
Guang is about to press the intercom button to call for help, but useful English words are not coming to him. And he’s afraid to be caught by the police. Guang can’t afford this: deliveries await; his bicycle awaits; his angry boss awaits.

8:13 p.m. Into the Night.
Songs “Go,” “Growing Awareness,” “At Least It’s Quiet,” “Bellyache,” “Esperar,” “Orange Beef”
Guang waits for a repairman. Memories of his son, Wang Yue, and wife, Ming, enter his consciousness; the Snakehead to whom he is indebted demands his payment.

9:00 a.m. Saturday. 14 hours.
Songs “Your Food,” “It Could Be Worse”
Guang is getting hungry and thirsty. He yells for help and bangs on the elevator. Nothing. The elevator becomes a suffocating ship container, with memories of his passage to America and his young nephew’s death during it.

6:15 p.m. 23 hours.
Songs “Stickup,” “Shame”
Guang dreams. He fights off the demands of a mugger, his boss’s wife, then Ming—but cannot control his bursting bladder. He wets himself. No one can know.

1:20 a.m. Sunday. Into Dawn. 30 hours.
Songs “Atlantic City,” “Delivery,” “Giant White Balloon,” “Takeout Man”
Guang imagines gambling in Atlantic City. As he tries to assure Ming that he has remained true, she faces temptation back in China. Guang must fight Snakehead and Elevator Monster as “Takeout Man.”

9:00 a.m. Sunday. 38 hours.
Songs “Real,” “Three Hungers,” “How to Get Out,” “Big Guang’s Long Island Chinese Buffet”
Guang decides to press the intercom button. Images of his past, present, and future self crowd his mind. General Tso of Homeland Security arrives to deport him. He dreams of a new, fancy life, but his hunger consumes his fantasy.

9:00 a.m. Monday. 62 hours.
Songs “Hunger,” “Useful,” “Alive”
Time becomes confusing. Guang wants to be useful, but is he just being used? He crushes his last fortune cookie: the fortune is blank. Guang joins a vast chorus of immigrants.

4:01 a.m. Tuesday. 81 hours.
Song “Rise”
The elevator doors open.
Part of what makes A.C.T. such a wonderful theater is that it both produces classical plays and takes chances on complicated, tough, and relevant new work—stories that need to be heard right now. When the creative team behind Stuck Elevator and I were trying to find a home for the play, we found that many theaters just did not know how to categorize it. In this country, where theater often has to be categorized, being unclassifiable can be a pretty unfortunate fate.

A.C.T.’s artistic director, Carey Perloff, saw beyond categories. She saw a story that needed to be told, especially in this country. I believe that today the story of one American belongs to all Americans. The white stories are not for the white people only; they are also for black people, Latinos, and Asians. Asian American stories belong to black and white Americans, and so on. The question is, When do we start coming together to tell the stories we need to hear so that we can grow as a nation? When do we start learning from each other to make this city and this country what they need to be?

The work begins, as usual, in the theater, where we take risks—sometimes brilliant, sometimes horrifying. No matter which, we are always here to tell stories.

The story of Stuck Elevator is not completely unique. It is basically the story of the person who has always been the backbone of America: the immigrant. What is really unique is the perspective it is told from: that of a Chinese immigrant who delivers food. He is someone whom we see frequently—someone whom we occasionally tip—but someone whom we do not know at all. It is my hope that once you leave the theater having experienced Aaron Jafferis and Byron Au Yong’s work, you may walk out into the street and see someone differently.

As I was working on this project, a certain phrase came to mind: “ordinary people living extraordinary lives.” This is it. This story is not only his, it’s yours. It’s ours.

Chay Yew

“I believe … the story of one American belongs to all Americans.”
Creating Stuck Elevator
A Conversation with Aaron Jafferis and Byron Au Yong
by Beatrice Basso

Stuck Elevator’s Aaron Jafferis defines himself as a “hip-hop poet and playwright”; Byron Au Yong, “a composer of songs of dislocation.” These definitions, which appear on their websites and electronic signatures, point to the very origins of their creative impulses.

Jafferis grew up in New Haven, Connecticut, where he currently resides, having lived in the Bay Area during college, Mexico City for two years (overstaying his tourist visa), and New York City for graduate school. A “white kid” in New Haven, he went to a primarily black high school; he also attended a lot of theater. It was from the discrepancy between what he saw on professional stages and what he lived daily that his need to make art emerged.

Attending UC Berkeley, Jafferis began to write poetry under the leadership of June Jordan, who started the Poetry for the People Program, which is still active today. Jafferis wove hip-hop elements into his poems because, as he says, “that was the poetry I knew and was most drawn to growing up.” He created his own interdisciplinary major with a focus on arts and social change. His thesis was a collection of his hip-hop poems strung together into a play in which “the characters were rapping back and forth to each other.” From these seeds and his further training at New York University grew musical works that are unafraid to make social statements and challenge the literary status quo.

The Pittsburgh-born, Seattle-raised Au Yong grew up on musical theater and action flicks; he then became interested in drama and the martial arts, alongside classical music. As he started his training as a composer, however, he found he was defined not by his interests, but by his ethnicity: his Chinese parents arrived in the United States in the mid 1960s via the Philippines, to which his grandparents had emigrated from China 30 years prior. Au Yong remembers, “When I was studying, there actually wasn’t necessarily a connection between my music and my family, and yet whatever I wrote, no matter what it was inspired by, it would be considered Chinese or Asian because the faculty would look at me and expect that.”

In searching for relevancy and identity, Au Yong discovered a “fascination for people who migrate around the world and what they carry with them.” His musical creations are inspired by the ideas of movement and songs and people who have been separated from their origins. His works are compilations of diasporas, scored for voices accompanied by Asian, European, and handmade instruments. (Stuck Elevator features an amplified bicycle wheel.) Thus came about his intriguing self-title: composer of songs of dislocation.

Neither Jafferis nor Au Yong sound like typical musical theater students, but they met in the graduate musical theater program at NYU. They were in different graduating classes, but after being paired together on a project, they started to collaborate on a piece called Axis, which explored George W. Bush’s “axis of evil” through song and rap.

Often school collaborations end at graduation, but the partnership between Jafferis and Au Yong has continued strong, as the creators of Stuck Elevator explained to us the week before rehearsals started at A.C.T.

What was the motivation to find each other again after school? Is Stuck Elevator your first professional collaboration?

Jafferis: Yes. When Byron proposed a few different ideas for collaboration, Stuck Elevator was the one that really jumped out at me. I’d been thinking about immigration and language and work a lot; I found myself living in Mexico City for a while. I came back eventually because I felt like a part of me was being lost, because of things I couldn’t express in Spanish, and I also felt the distance from my family and friends back here. So I was interested in the dislocation that had happened in me. That connected to the dislocation that Byron was talking about in his music, which then connected in its most extreme form to the story of Ming Kuang Chen, which was the basis of this show.

Byron, this project started for you when you read an article about Ming Kuang Chen being stuck in a Bronx elevator for 81 hours.

Au Yong: Yes, and there were earlier articles in which Ming Kuang Chen was reported missing. It was in the newspapers they would hand out in the subway in New York City, where I was still a student. Whenever I see a Chinese guy in the newspaper I’m curious, and so I was drawn to this, probably also because, at the time, a number of Chinese-food deliverymen had been killed. There was a famous case of one who had been beaten to death by two teenagers with a baseball bat when he was delivering food, so everyone was really concerned about not being able to find Chen.

When they found him [discovering he had survived being trapped in an elevator for almost four days], that’s when the news really caught on. It came out that Chen had paid $60,000 to be smuggled here, that he had a wife and son back in China, that he’s from Fujian Province, that he rode a bicycle to work. This man’s life really resonated with me, because here I was in New York City, also with a $60,000 debt because of grad school. My grandparents left Fujian Province, and Chen and I are from the same generation, and so I thought, “If my grandparents had never left China, if circumstances were different, I could actually be this guy.” So I started to imagine that and asked Aaron if he was interested in working on Stuck Elevator.

Does the music come first? Do the words? Do you shoot ideas back and forth?

AU YONG: I think fairly early on I knew that the music for Stuck Elevator would become “stuck” and it wouldn’t be able to get out of itself for a while. The melody would hang out on one note or just cycle through a number of pitches. Then we identified different moments, and characters grew out of that. Stylistically we were not sure what it was. I remember at one point I thought it might have to be a guy screaming in Chinese for an hour onstage. And I think Aaron was open to that.

What is really great about collaborating with Aaron is getting to have those conversations, figuring out what the really dramatic theatrical moments are onstage that I would enjoy sitting through, and then figuring out logistically how to make those moments come alive with words and music.

You both seem to be unafraid to show the connection between art and social awareness and change.

AU YONG: For me it’s a challenging topic, because as a composer I realize that music is abstract, and I don’t believe that music is a universal language; I do feel that music can be misinterpreted and can serve multiple functions. That’s actually why I’m invested in working with writers such as Aaron, because words can be really direct and they can hit viscerally—they can surround an issue in ways that are as complex as the issue itself, whereas music can hide things that actually need to be much more transparent. With Stuck Elevator, having both the words and the music is crucial, even “Make art like our lives depend on it.” That’s what you said upon receiving the Arts Award from The Arts Council of Greater New Haven in 2011, Aaron. I'd love for you to expand on this statement.

JAFFERIS: The first thing that I ever wrote came out of a need to express myself in response to friends of mine at UC Berkeley who would talk disparagingly about cities like New Haven and inject fear about the black and brown people who live in cities like New Haven. Two things made those moments very difficult for me: on one hand, my difficulty in expressing myself clearly in arguments, and, on the other hand, my experience growing up in New Haven as a young white kid at my [primarily black] high school, and having this really positive experience, a very personal experience that belied the things that my white friends at Berkeley were telling me. And so, unable to respond in words in the moment, I tried to write my personal story in a way that connected to a major issue like racism.

With that quote, I was talking about all the murders that had happened in New Haven that year. Especially of young people. I feel like it's the artist's job to point out the beauty and value of human life. Especially in a violent time in a violent country. If I feel okay about killing somebody, maybe it's partly because I don't feel the value and beauty of their life in my gut. I think art can, over time, build that empathy in our guts. And nonviolence takes that kind of guts.

As serious as the topics Stuck Elevator addresses are, you two are clearly having a lot of fun with this show.

AU YONG: To figure out what it meant to be trapped literally, I watched Buster Keaton movies. As only children, both Aaron and I learned early on how to amuse ourselves. This carries through in Stuck Elevator, where the only way to survive the dreary situation is through humor.

JAFFERIS: On the dreary plane ride to San Francisco, I told the urologist sitting next to me about the show. She asked about the character's bodily functions and proceeded to draw me pictures of a full bladder—walking around on legs. We laughed. Guang feels disconnected in this country, like I did from that urologist, so he uses humor to connect.

Where do you think Stuck Elevator fits in the world of musical theater? We used to call it a “hip-hop opera”; we are now calling it a “musical.” Does it matter?

JAFFERIS: Calling it an opera will turn off a bunch of people or will only speak to another bunch of people; calling it a musical will also only speak to a specific group. Because I believe that the piece will speak to all of these people, it has been hard to name. It's hard to think of a label that doesn't conjure up a particular audience.

AU YONG: I think that’s one of the really sad aspects of the music world: that there are these genres. As musicians, that is our continual struggle: Where are we going to be filed? Is it classical, or indie, or world music? I have so many influences, I don't know if there is one specific category. Hopefully the work will resonate with a lot of audiences.

“The only way to survive the dreary situation is through humor.”

What does it mean to you that this show will have its world premiere in San Francisco?

AU YONG: I think A.C.T. is amazing and I’m really excited to work here. Stuck Elevator is an incredible leap of faith. I realize that it is a wild card in a lot of senses. But San Francisco seemed the perfect place to launch this work, because San Francisco has been a port of entry for Chinese for generations. There are certain things that San Francisco understands as a port of entry for Asians, and as a major international city. And it's also a city that has elevators!

JAFFERIS: The Bay Area is where my belief in the connection between arts and social justice was born with the activist poets of Poetry for the People, and I feel like the environment is a really live one for art that speaks to social justice.

My final question is, Do you imagine a journey after A.C.T. for Stuck Elevator?

JAFFERIS: I would love to see it in New Haven—connecting the ideas in the play with the various immigrant movements that are happening in New Haven. I think there's a lot of potential there.

AU YONG: I think the A.C.T. production will reveal a lot of what's to come down the line. Audiences here will teach us, they will show us more possibilities of what Stuck Elevator prompts, what the conversations around the work are, and then I think we'll have a clearer understanding of where it can go from here.

A.C.T. celebrated the opening of The Costume Shop theater in Central Market in 2011. Mayor Ed Lee hailed the venture as "a wonderful example of the spirit that has taken hold on Central Market to transform and infuse the area with art, performance, and gathering spaces."

In addition to our mainstage season, A.C.T. offers a variety of programs that make art accessible to the public, contributing to San Francisco’s thriving arts scene with new venues, new voices, and new ideas. Here’s a peek at some of what’s happening offstage and behind the scenes.

Community

While A.C.T. is an internationally recognized institution that has presented world-class theater in San Francisco since 1967, we’ve also been a gathering place for the Bay Area arts community.

This season, A.C.T. has hosted a wide variety of local performing arts organizations in our new experimental performance venue in the Central Market neighborhood, The Costume Shop. Thanks to a partnership with the San Francisco Neighborhoods Arts Collaborative and the Kenneth Rainin Foundation, A.C.T. has offered the space at no charge to an incredible lineup of performances, from such established institutions as Magic Theatre and Lorraine Hansberry Theatre to smaller organizations including Singers of the Street, a community choir of San Franciscans affected by homelessness.

A.C.T.’s ACTsmart education programs not only bring our artists into public schools around the Bay Area, they also connect us with community youth groups such as the Tenderloin Boys & Girls Club, the Mission-based 826 Valencia literary initiative, and Oakland’s Destiny Arts Center. These partnerships help extend the depth and reach of A.C.T.’s programs to youth across the region.

A.C.T. is currently renovating Central Market’s Strand Theater, scheduled to open in 2015 as a new 299-seat theater with a 2,500-square-foot event/performance space, which will also serve as a classroom and meeting hall. Designed to set Market Street aglow, The Strand will be a nucleus for the San Francisco arts community.

Around each of the shows in our subscription season, we also provide a series of InterACT events, from interactive family workshops with theater artists to lively discussions with local experts. These events bring audiences and artists together to meet, mingle, and learn more about the show.

How well do you know A.C.T.?
Access & Education

A.C.T. offers a variety of programs that engage our community in meaningful arts experiences, providing a safe yet dynamic space in which students of all ages can creatively explore social and personal issues. Our education programs aim to empower citizens of today, while developing the artists and audiences of tomorrow.

A.C.T. launched our Student Matinee program in 1968, making it one of the oldest in the country. This affordable and accessible program has since seen more than half a million students attend mainstage and conservatory productions. The experience comes complete with interactive pre- and postshow workshops, lively postshow discussions with the actors, and in-depth study guides.

Each year A.C.T. offers thousands of free tickets and theater-based workshops to social service agencies and community-based organizations in our community, including the Canon Kip Senior Center, La Voz Latina, and Tenderloin Neighborhood Development Corporation, among many others.

Now in its second year, our ACTsmart Intensive Residency program engages youth in San Francisco’s public continuation high schools in theatrical writing and performance. Our residencies provide the skills and opportunity for teenagers from across San Francisco to express their powerful voices through the dramatic art form.

The A.C.T. Master of Fine Arts Program’s annual Will on Wheels outreach tour brings Shakespeare to schools and community venues across the Bay Area, often performing for youth who have never before experienced a live theater production.

Last summer, A.C.T. piloted Back to the Source, a professional development program for educators who are committed to using theater techniques in the classroom. The week-long intensive allows teachers to immerse themselves in the art of theater to acquire tools to engage students in a variety of subjects using drama techniques. Thanks to the generosity of the Moca Foundation, Bay Area public school teachers receive priority for scholarships, making the program accessible to educators who serve our community.

A.C.T. is committed to nurturing artists from all backgrounds and to presenting stories that reflect the unique cultural landscape of San Francisco, as well as the complex makeup of the global society in which we live. Whether considering immigration rights (Stuck Elevator), queer politics (Tales of the City; The Normal Heart; "8"), or the birth of the civil rights movement (The Scottsboro Boys), A.C.T. strives to produce work that is relevant to the lives of a broad cross-section of San Francisco and captures the Bay Area’s particular zeitgeist.

In League of Resident Theatre (LORT) professional nonprofit organizations today, women make up just 19 percent of artistic directors and 31 percent of executive directors. With women holding the positions of artistic director, executive director, conservatory director, director of education, and chair of the board of trustees, A.C.T. is leading the charge to more equitable theater leadership.

A.C.T. maintains a number of international partnerships, collaborating and exchanging work across cultures and bringing you perspectives from around the world. In the current and upcoming seasons, A.C.T. has or will work with artists from Italy, France, Scotland, and Canada.

New Works

A.C.T. is committed to illuminating dramatic classics while providing a rich and fruitful home for new plays and new theatrical forms and voices.

This season, A.C.T. produced two world premieres in a 1,000-seat house, something extremely rare in American theater.

Each year, A.C.T. commissions new plays written specifically for the graduate-level students in our M.F.A. Program and the teenage performers in our Young Conservatory.

With the opening of The Strand Theater on Market Street in 2015, A.C.T. will introduce New Strands to increase the visibility of works commissioned, developed, or first produced by A.C.T. The annual New Strands Festival will bring playwrights, musicians, dancers, and multidisciplinary artists together with the public through free workshop presentations and readings.

A portion of our New Strands commissions will be dedicated to works exploring the history and community of San Francisco.

Innovation

A.C.T. is an organization that fosters collaboration and conversation across generations and boundaries throughout the company.

A.C.T. employs a full-time artistic company, including local actors, directors, dramaturgs, and teaching artists. Many of our professional artists mentor young actors both in our Conservatory and in the community. M.F.A. Program students also mentor Young Conservatory students and students in our ACTsmart Intensive Residency programs.

Our M.F.A. Program is designed to train generative artists and gives students the opportunity to experience all aspects of developing and presenting their own work in a professional context.

At 8:30 p.m. on the evening of Friday, April 1, 2005, Ming Kuang Chen, a 35-year-old deliveryman for the Bronx’s Happy Dragon Chinese takeout counter, biked to Tracey Towers, a high-rise apartment complex just a few blocks away. When Chen did not return to the restaurant by 9:30 p.m., his coworkers knew something was wrong and called the police. Since 2000, there had been two high-profile murders of Chinese-food deliverymen and everybody assumed the worst. The NYPD pulled 100 officers from around the borough to look for Chen. They canvassed Tracey Tower’s 871 apartments and scoured the nearby park and reservoir; the search lasted all weekend, but turned up nothing.

By Saturday, the media had caught wind of the story. It soon came out that Chen was an undocumented immigrant from Fujian Province in southeast China. He worked 12-hour days and six-day weeks, earning him about $300 a week. He sent some back to his wife and 12-year-old son in China. The rest he used to pay down his debt. He owed $60,000 for his illegal passage to New York City.

The Fujianese immigration boom began in the early 1980s, when young disenfranchised men learned that a dishwasher in New York’s Chinatown could make in a month what a peasant in Fujian might make in a year. Early attempts in the 1960s and ’70s to emigrate unassisted had mixed results: many were discovered and deported back to China. They wanted a more certain method, and from this desire emerged the shétóu, or snakehead: an immigration broker of sorts, whose clients—sometimes called “snakes,” “snaketails,” or “ducks”—willingly accepted their terms in exchange for safe passage to the States.

The field was relatively small in the beginning, usually just family helping family and friends helping friends. But as it became clear there was money to be made, the relationship between snakeheads and their clients grew less familial. The once-intricate process originally involved forged documents, plane tickets, and a network of operatives called “little snakeheads,” but these complications were costly. Soon snakeheads delivered their fares in the bellies of overcrowded boats. Later, they shipped them over in poorly ventilated container ships. Even as the conditions of transportation grew more dangerous, the snakehead’s price increased: in the mid 1980s, each immigrant paid around $18,000 apiece; by 2004, the going rate was $75,000.

For the first five years after arriving in New York, undocumented immigrants did little besides work long shifts in hard jobs to pay off their debts, which they typically owed to friends and relations who helped them pay the snakeheads upon arrival. Snakeheads who did not receive what they were owed would resort to intimidation and violence. Lest the police suspect this was the fate of Chen, his family assured them he had already paid off what he owed.

Shortly after 4:00 a.m. on Tuesday, April 5 (three and half days after Chen went missing), an elevator alarm sounded at Tracey Towers. Express elevator no. 2, which was not supposed to make stops between the 2nd and 21st floors, had become stuck between the 3rd and 4th—boxed in on four sides by the concrete shaft. When firefighters got the doors open at 6:05 a.m., Chen stepped out, a little unsteady but under his own power. He had been trapped without food and water for 81 hours.

Chen was taken to a hospital, where he was treated for dehydration but otherwise deemed fine. When reporters caught up with him five months later, he reported suffering from PTSD, which made it hard for him to work. But more problematic was the fact that the newspapers had announced his immigration status and he was afraid to return to the Happy Dragon. As of February 2006, he was known to be working in the kitchen of a Chinese restaurant outside the city; after that, he fell off the radar.

A recipient of France’s Chevalier de l’Ordre des Arts et des Lettres and the National Corporate Theatre Fund’s 2007 Artistic Achievement Award, Perloff received a B.A. Phi Beta Kappa in classics and comparative literature from Stanford University and was a Fulbright Fellow at Oxford. She was on the faculty of the Tisch School of the Arts at New York University for seven years and teaches and directs in the A.C.T. Master of Fine Arts Program. She is the proud mother of Lexie and Nicholas.

Ellen Richard
(Executive Director) joined A.C.T. as executive director in August 2010. She served previously as executive director of off Broadway’s nonprofit Second Stage Theatre in New York City. During her tenure at Second Stage, she was responsible for the purchase contract of the Helen Hayes Theatre and substantial growth in subscription income and growth in individual giving. Under Richard’s leadership, Second Stage provided the initial home for the Broadway productions Everyday Rapture, Next to Normal, and The Little Dog Laughed.

From 1983 to 2005, Richard enjoyed a rich and varied career with Roundabout Theatre Company. By the time she departed as managing director, Roundabout had been transformed from a small nonprofit on the verge of bankruptcy into one of the country’s largest and most successful theater companies of its kind. Richard is the recipient of six Tony Awards as producer, for Roundabout productions of Cabaret (1998), A View from the Bridge (1998), Side Man (1999), Nine (2003), Assassins (2004), and Glengarry Glen Ross (2005). Producer of more than 125 shows at Roundabout, she had direct supervision of all general and production management, marketing, and financial aspects of the theater’s operations. She conceptualized and oversaw the redesign of the three permanent Roundabout stages—Studio 54, the American Airlines Theatre, and the Harold and Miriam Steinberg Center for Theatre. She directed the location search for Cabaret and supervised the creation of that production’s environmental Kit Kat Klub.

Prior to her tenure at Roundabout, Richard served as business manager of Westport Country Playhouse, theater manager for Stamford Center for the Arts, and business manager for Atlas Scenic Studio. She began her career working as a stagehand, sound designer, and scenic artist assistant.

Melissa Smith
(Conservatory Director) oversees the administration of the A.C.T. Master of Fine Arts Program, Young Conservatory, Summer Training Congress, and Studio A.C.T., in addition to serving as the master acting teacher of the M.F.A. Program. Before joining A.C.T. in 1995, Smith served as director of the program in theater and dance at Princeton University, where she taught acting for six years. She has worked with people of all ages in venues around the country, including teaching in Hawaii and in Florence, Italy. Also a professional actor, she has performed in numerous off-off Broadway plays and at regional theaters, including A.C.T. In 2004 she toured London and Birmingham (U.K.) in Berkeley Repertory Theatre’s production of Continental Divide. Smith holds a B.A. in English and theater from Yale College and an M.F.A. in acting from Yale School of Drama.
