American Conservatory Theater Founding General Director William Ball, at the forefront of the regional theater movement, wanted to create a company outside New York that would have a significant national impact while providing an alternative to commercial theater. After a group of San Francisco civic leaders attended A.C.T.'s West Coast debut at Stanford University in 1966, they invited Ball and his company to settle in San Francisco, which was without a resident theater company. A.C.T. has been dedicated to bringing the power of live theater to San Francisco audiences since the company’s first rousing performance of Ball’s Tartuffe in the Geary Theater (now called the American Conservatory Theater) on January 21, 1967.

A.C.T.’s majestic stage opened January 10, 1910, rising from the rubble of the catastrophic earthquake and fires of 1906. It was immediately hailed as one of the grandest playhouses in the United States. In 1975 the Geary was awarded a place on the U.S. Department of the Interior’s National Register of Historic Places and named a landmark of the State of California and the City and County of San Francisco. In 1989 the Loma Prieta earthquake ripped a gaping hole in the ceiling, destroying the proscenium arch and dumping tons of equipment and debris on the first six rows of orchestra seats. Nevertheless, A.C.T.’s second artistic director, Edward Hastings (who succeeded Ball in 1986), never considered canceling the season. For the next six years, A.C.T. performed in seven different venues around the city. “We had to encourage people to come back to this devastated, ravished, magical place called San Francisco,” remembered Hastings. “And what they found in the theater were a lot of other people who were shook up. So there we were, all together in a theater, helping bring the city back together again.”

With the support of a community that contributed to a record-breaking $28.5 million capital campaign, the Geary reopened in 1996 with a production of The Tempest directed by A.C.T.’s current artistic director, Carey Perloff, who took over after Hastings retired in 1992. Committed to proving that theater is still “a place where language is kept alive and functional and muscular and breathing,” Perloff reaffirmed A.C.T.’s mission to expose San Francisco to exceptional works from across our rich theatrical tradition. She reintroduced the core acting company (which had been disbanded decades earlier) to keep top-quality local actors working, and she committed herself to “locavore” theater—theater made by, for, and about the community that supports it—with San Francisco–centered productions like After the War, The Tosca Project, and the much-beloved 2011 hit Armistead Maupin’s Tales of the City.

Since the company’s founding, A.C.T. has infused the Bay Area with some of the best young acting talent in the nation. The company first began training outside actors in the summer of 1967, and by 1969, the conservatory had expanded to include a year-long course of study, which has since evolved into the three-year, fully accredited, top-ranked Master of Fine Arts Program. M.F.A. Program students often grace the mainstage and return to perform at A.C.T. as alumni; they are also regulars on stages around the Bay Area and beyond. Other programs include the Young Conservatory, which offers training and performance opportunities for students ages 8 to 19; Studio A.C.T., which offers acting classes for adults; and the Summer Training Congress, which attracts students from around the world.

With the arrival of distinguished Executive Director Ellen Richard, the recent conclusion of a long-range strategic planning process, the introduction of an education department, and the opening of a new performance space (The Costume Shop, located in the Mid-Market neighborhood across from UN Plaza), A.C.T. is poised to continue its leadership role in securing the future of theater for San Francisco—and the nation.

My life here
Dear Friends,

Early in the rehearsal process for Wajdi Mouawad’s beautiful Scorched, it became clear to me that the play is all about the vulnerability and beauty of real bodies in space. Mouawad created Scorched in collaboration with a group of actors who brought their own fears and fantasies, histories and hopes to the rehearsal room every day; over eight months, the material they generated was cultivated in the playwright’s fertile imagination to generate the script we now have before us. In an essay about the play, Mouawad talks about the stage as “the scene of ruthless consolation.” Consolation for what? For terrible dreams and terrible realities; for the reprisals and vendettas of his native Lebanon; for the torment of twins growing up unloved.

Scorched is a thriller, a mystery, a search for identity that sends two Canadian twins on a frightening journey of discovery into their mother’s past in the Middle East. I am always fascinated when Americans explore refugee stories, because if we go back far enough, each of us has one. That’s what it is to be an American (or indeed a Canadian!). Our company for Scorched has roots in many different parts of the world: Armenia, Iran, Turkey, Lebanon, Greece, Nigeria, Portugal, Ireland, and the Pacific Islands. During the first day of rehearsal, we all went around the table and told our family stories—stories of escape and suffering, of rescue and survival. One theme emerged immediately: that of silence.

As in the play, the actors said again and again that their parents had never told them about the conflicts that had led to their emigration. Civil war and tribal violence are the most difficult to reconcile, so the postrefugee generation often has to learn his or her family history from textbooks rather than from parents. Mouawad has said he had no real understanding of the brutal conflict in Lebanon until he began to study it in books and newspapers. In Scorched, a mother who has been severely traumatized remains silent for the last five years of her life. Her children are the victims of this silence, and the journey of the play is the journey of finally cracking that silence open.

Rehearsing Scorched has been like staging a dreamscape in which many threads are kept in motion at the same time, as fragments of the past keep intruding on the present. The play is extremely Greek in its structure and preoccupations: as in Greek tragedy, children must avenge the disasters of their parents, oracles are consulted and discredited, twins are separated and then reunite, and the truth hides out in the open where no one wants to see it. Mouawad knows the setting is his native Middle East, yet never names it as such, because it is both specific and universal, just as Sophoclean drama is both about a specific moment in fifth-century BCE Greece and about something larger and eternal. I love this kind of play, because it is pure theater: it doesn’t fully yield its secrets on the page, but finds its form when the visual world, the music, the language, and the physical life of the actors all weave together into a single theatrical tapestry. The specific faces and bodies of the nine actors in the room have been our guides: physical beings whose bodies are vulnerable and strong, Western and Middle Eastern, alone and together, funny and heartbreaking.

Scorched has been rendered from Quebecois French into English by a remarkable translator, Linda Gaboriau, with whom we have had the pleasure of collaborating several times before, notably on Michel Tremblay’s For the Pleasure of Seeing Her Again in 2002. What she has accomplished with Scorched is no mere translation: it is truly a feat of cultural transplantation.

This play is the product of an amazing cultural collision. It is both a Middle Eastern play and a Canadian play, a product of a Lebanese-Quebecois theater artist who is obsessed with Greek tragedy and who has a wicked sense of humor. As such, Scorched continues A.C.T.’s ongoing dialogue with our North American colleagues (I first encountered the play while directing Phèdre at the Stratford Shakespeare Festival in Ontario), while introducing the complex world of the Middle East to the American Conservatory Theater for the first time. It is a strange coincidence that while I was rehearsing Scorched, Associate Artistic Director Mark Rucker was directing my play Higher down the hall, a play that is also set in the Middle East, although in a very different time and place.

We are incredibly grateful for the opportunity to work on this remarkable play and are thrilled to share it with you today. Thank you for coming!

The Price of Memory
BY EMILY HOFFMAN

As soon as the dust had settled on the final skirmishes of the 15-year Lebanese Civil War, which left over 100,000 dead and a million displaced, rebuilding began in Beirut, the country’s capital and the birthplace of playwright Wajdi Mouawad. Mouawad’s family had fled the country soon after the war’s outbreak in 1975; by the time it ended in 1991, he was finishing his final year at the National Theatre School in Montreal.

Mouawad’s parents told him nothing about the war they had fled; what he learned, he learned from books. He found, though, that war began to enter his plays, and with it, Lebanon, though never by name. Scorched takes place in a Middle Eastern no place, as much Sophocles’ Greece as it is anywhere ravaged by the relentless logic of violence and revenge. And yet the play’s treatment of war, its focus on silence and buried memory, is particular to the psychic aftermath of the Lebanese Civil War.

In 1991, the Beirut of Mouawad’s childhood, once known as the Paris of the Middle East and crowded with ornate French and Ottoman architecture and busy cafés, lay in ruins, a reminder of the years of carnage that had overtaken the country and erased the line between combatant and civilian. For then-prime minister Rafik Hariri, if the country was to move forward, it dominated, with crumbling buildings and graveyards strewn across the countryside. But the war could not be mentioned in polite conversation—if it was, it was referred to as “the events,” or sometimes “the war of the others” (namely: Syria, Israel, and the Palestinians, who used Lebanon as a stage for their own proxy wars). In the decade following the war, it was not taught in school; it was glossed over in university history courses. According to Lebanese film director Randa Chahal Sabbag, whose films have been banned in her home country, “There has been a huge national effort to erase and forget all traces of the war.” In 1999, Lee Hockstader, foreign correspondent for the Washington Post, called this phenomenon “an officially sanctioned amnesia.” Historian Sune Haugbolle’s book War and Memory in Lebanon begins, “When the war ended in Lebanon, it was like it never happened.”

The era of amnesia was ushered in with a law passed by the Lebanese parliament in 1991 that granted a general amnesty for nearly all war-related crimes committed between 1975 and 1991, making it impossible to try or condemn those responsible for the scores of massacres committed during the war, even those responsible for the infamous slaughter of almost 3,000 Palestinians at the Sabra and Shatila refugee camps. Amnesty laws are not uncommon in countries where complicated long-lasting conflicts leave most of the population (and those capable of governing) implicated. In South Africa after the fall of the apartheid government, a special Amnesty Committee was established in 1996 to grant pardons for crimes committed during the apartheid era—so long as the crimes were politically motivated and proportionate, and so long as those seeking amnesty fully disclosed the details of the crime to the committee. Disclosure was key: the “amnesty for truth” bargain was struck to avoid punishing an entire outgoing regime and its affiliates, while ensuring that the regime’s crimes were not simply covered up and forgotten. Archbishop Desmond Tutu, the leader and spiritual guide of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission, explained the guiding principle:

None of us has the power to say, “Let bygones be bygone” and, hey presto, they then become bygones. Our common experience in fact is the opposite—that the past, far from disappearing or lying down and being quiet, is embarrassingly persistent, and will return and haunt us unless it has been dealt with adequately. Unless we look the beast in the eye we will find that it returns to hold us hostage.

Many victims concluded at the end of the painful and grueling 244 days of testimony that the trials were a sham to protect the war criminals of apartheid; even so, the model of truth-seeking as a necessary precursor to peace has taken hold globally, and has been used in Argentina, Chile, Guatemala, and Germany, to name only a few postconflict arenas.

By issuing a universal amnesty without conditions, the Lebanese government evaded the question of truth-seeking from the get-go. Without official encouragement to process the devastation of the war—and often in the face of active discouragement—traumatic memories of the war turned in on themselves. Haugbolle writes,

When there is no echo of (often traumatic) personal war memories to be found in collective memory, the reality of those memories are liable to be put in doubt. . . . In the frenzy of getting on with their lives, many people left the rupture from their past selves of the war years unaddressed, and to establish a sense of connection with that reality was held to be so outlandish that the past simply appeared unreal.

Silence pervaded the Lebanese diaspora as well. “The younger generation as well as those who spent the war years outside the country may not have felt the same sense of trauma as those who lived through the war,” Haugbolle writes, “but they suffered nonetheless from a sense of alienation from an amnesic society, which did not let them know about the events that they were obliged to accept as formative of contemporary Lebanon.” Mouawad explained in a 2008 interview with CBC News why his parents were silent on the subject: “It was a very shameful war, where fathers killed sons, where sons killed their brothers, where sons raped their mothers. . . . They didn’t want to explain to my generation what had happened. . . . Strangers had to tell me my own story.” This disconnect is not uncommon in refugee and immigrant families, where the first generation often withholds not only traumatic stories but sometimes even a native language so their children can begin with a clean slate in their new country.

The argument for suppression and silence—promoted by the Lebanese government and welcomed by a large portion of the populace—went like this: the war was too long and too destructive, the sectarian allegiances too convoluted and shifting, the number of the responsible too large, the tear in the social fabric too gaping, for any commemoration to happen that would not incite division and anger and destroy the tenuous peace. Best move forward with the things we can agree on—development, houses, shopping malls.

This logic may be hard to stomach for anyone steeped in the common wisdom of philosopher George Santayana, “Those who cannot remember the past are condemned to repeat it,” or the powerful post-Holocaust warning, “Never again.” And yet, what is the perennial problem of the Middle East but an excess of memory? Beginning with the Zionist claim over an ancient homeland, the citing of past grievances has spurred the region’s conflicts, seemingly without end. Every single massacre committed during the Lebanese Civil War was an act of reprisal. Might not the country, then, and its neighbors, benefit from a good dose of forgetfulness?
But memory is often the only tool of the disenfranchised. The ruling class dictates which memories the nation may hold on to and which memories must be dispelled for a group to be accepted into the body politic. The celebrated Palestinian Lebanese author Mahmoud Darwish has chided the entire Middle East for the unreasonable demand to forget it has placed on Palestinian refugees: “Why then should those whom the waves of forgetfulness have cast upon the shores of Beirut be expected to go against nature? Why should so much amnesia be expected of them? And who can construct for them a new memory with no content other than the broken shadow of a distant life in a shack made of sheet metal? Is there enough forgetfulness for them to forget?”

The question, then: does there exist a healthy middle-ground of memory? A type of memory that shames us with its horrors, gives voice to the disenfranchised, but does not spur us to revenge? Artists in postwar Lebanon and the Lebanese diaspora, Haugbolle argues, have tried to answer this question with their work. He points to Hassan Saouli’s installation piece 13th of April, which consists of a bus of exactly the same make as the famous Dodge passenger bus that set off the war when it was attacked in 1975, filled with video, text, and images concerned with memories of the war and questions of guilt and forgiveness. When asked why he did not use the actual bus—which still exists—Saouli responded, “The bus is a symbol of the civil war, but I am trying to show it in an artistic manner. I avoided using graphical images and items that are disturbing—photos of those killed, blood, violence. The actual bus in its poor condition could be considered a disturbing image. Therefore, I used a bus of the same model so I could put an artistic twist to it and lessen its bitterness.”

Not all artists have tried to soften their representations of the war. Haugbolle also cites Sabbag’s film Civilized People, which juxtaposes the humorous and the grotesque in a searing indictment of the Lebanese people’s participation in “the war of the others.” Haugbolle describes: “Here are militiamen killing themselves while attempting to tie dynamite to a cat, Muslim militias fighting it out over a refrigerator, small kids imploring their parents to kidnap foreigners and so on. . . . The intent is clear: to show that the Lebanese, in Sabbag’s own words, participated in everything. . . . We’ve been criminals and now we’ve forgotten, which is the worst moment since it’s so false. Then our children will come and ask us why we did what we did.”

Though Mouawad has rejected the characterization of Scorched as a Lebanese play, deeply concerned as it is with questions of memory and trauma, it cannot but be a part of the postwar Lebanese dialogue about how to remember. And his very refusal to name the country in his play as Lebanon, or to name any of the groups in the conflict, might be seen as the partial articulation of an answer.

As time passed, and the war receded a decade into history, attitudes about discussing it began to relax. The events of 2005 brought a major resurgence of war memory to Lebanon: the prime minister was assassinated, and the Lebanese blamed their Syrian occupiers, who had gained enormous control over Lebanese politics after the war. Suddenly, as hundreds of thousands of Lebanese took to the streets in what became known as the Cedar Revolution, war memories—in the form of political posters, slogans, and news media—were mobilized and reoriented into a narrative of us versus them: us, the collective nation of Lebanon; them, the Syrians. The Cedar Revolution was successful, and the Syrians ended their 30-year occupation.

But unified nationalism did not last. Memory is fickle, after all, especially when it is distorted to political ends. The simplified narrative fractured again into its constituent parts—and has, in the years since 2005, been exploited by the radical Shia group Hezbollah to gain ascendancy. Sectarianism with its selective memory is on the rise, even as cosmopolitan Beirut looks blindly towards the future, and artists try to find a more universal meaning in the past.

Over the last decade, playwright, director, and performer Wajdi Mouawad has gained an international reputation as a major force in Quebecois theater. He graduated from the National Theatre School of Canada in 1991 and by 1999 had solidified a reputation as one of Quebec’s rising stars, with numerous celebrated productions and the artistic directorship of Montreal’s Théâtre de Quat’Sous, where he served until 2004, to his credit. In 2002, the government of France named him a Chevalier de l’Ordre National des Arts et des Lettres. He spends much of his time in Paris, despite the fact that in 2007 he began a five-year term as artistic director of the National Arts Centre French Theatre (NAC) in Ontario. “In his writing as in his directing,” states the NAC in the press release announcing his appointment, “Mr. Mouawad investigates the tension between the importance of individual resistance and the no less essential renunciation of the self. On this subject he is fond of quoting Kafka: ’In the struggle between yourself and the world, back the world.’”

Mouawad has lived with the tension between personal agency and unstoppable world forces since his childhood, which he has summarized as “one war, two exiles, and a death.” Born in Beirut, he was six when the Lebanese Civil War erupted in April 1975. Hundreds of thousands fled the country, including Mouawad and his family, who emigrated to Paris. In 1983, unable to renew their French visas, they moved again, this time to Quebec. Mouawad’s mother died from cancer a year later.

“What was hard [about growing up] was the silence,” Mouawad told Canada’s Globe and Mail in 2002. His parents did not talk about the home they had left behind, or why they had left it. For Mouawad, Lebanon was “a little garden behind the house in the mountain. It’s the sun and a strangely happy time.” Later, he learned about the horrors his family escaped—not from his parents but from reading French and U.S. historians. “My parents weren’t people with the emotional armor to deal with a civil war,” said Mouawad. “It was this silence that I have tried to name.”

Mouawad’s penchant for antinaturalistic storytelling—starting with his love of Kafka’s Metamorphosis and the works of Sophocles—set him apart from his English-speaking classmates when he attended the National Theatre School. He watched with amusement as they lugged in real fridges and couches to use in their sets. Mouawad was more attracted to productions like that of Quebecois multidisciplinary innovator Robert Lepage, which taught him “that one could do anything in the theater.” Mouawad’s work has often been compared to that of Lepage, but Mouawad is quick to point out the difference: “The plays of Robert are about Quebecois trying to discover the world, in Japan, Russia, France, London. In all my plays, there is the story of someone who discovers his origins are different from what he thinks, and he tries to get back to those origins.”

Like his characters, Mouawad is trying to unearth his own origins—to name the silence of his parents. When he wrote Journée de noces chez les Cro-Magnons (Wedding Day at the Cro-Magnons) in the mid 1990s, memories of Lebanon were unlocked for him. In this absurdist play, a family attempts to conduct a groomless wedding as a relentless bombing campaign rocks their apartment. “I understood then that I had experienced war,” Mouawad remembered in 2010. “For me, until that moment, war was only for those who stayed in Lebanon. The memories came back. It was a shock.”

After Cro-Magnons came Littoral (Tideline, 1997), a metaphysical play centered around a young Montreal man’s attempts to bury his father in their unnamed homeland. It was the first play of what would become The Blood of Promises cycle, a tetralogy that also includes Incendies (Scorched, 2003), Forêts (Forests, 2006), and Ciels (Skies, 2009). Incendies (which was adapted into an Academy Award–nominated film with the same name) was inspired by the experiences of perhaps the most famous prisoner of the Lebanese Civil War, Soha Bechara, who spent ten years in the brutal Khiam prison for her attempted assignation of a head general of the South Lebanon Army; but it was with Littoral that war first entered Mouawad’s plays, he explained in 2010: “War is where the collective and the intimate collide. My question is how to be happy personally when the collective isn’t working. The history of our inner lives is as complex as our collective history. In the stories that I tell, I ask the questions: How far can we go? How do we console? How do we find safety?”

What does one do once suffering arrives? This is the question Mouawad explores most in his plays. “More often than not,” he has said, “you have to integrate suffering into your life. Become it. And let it move you into another country, so that it can become something else.” For him, suffering has become theater. But while he transforms it into drama, grief is not the basis of his art:
His parents did leave, however, and Mouawad found in the theater an outlet for their silence—and a home for his words. Since the 1990s, he has been dramatizing the experience of first-generation exiles in a series of epic dramas. Forever haunted by what his parents left unsaid, he has tried to create a forum in which ideas, pain, and joy can be shared, because theater has the power to connect people:

"The theater is a live place, where everyone—actors, audience members—are alive. It’s not like the movies, where some are dead, maybe, and where those that you watch no longer look like what you are seeing. In the theater, everyone is there. There are people who are going to die, in front of other people who are going to die, but who are alive at the same time. Moreover, these people are gathered around this very particular thing, which is the word. From the beginning, this word is not trying to sell me something, to convince me to vote for someone or believe an idea. This word exists apart from all desire for profit. It uses the fundamental notion of being together: I listen to someone who speaks to me. Theater brings together people who have come to listen to a cry that will upset them. This freedom seems fundamental to me today."

I prefer to think that poetry comes from itself. . . . I don’t write plays because I saw war, I write plays because I saw plays. War is one of the elements that I work with because I have it at hand, but it’s not what formed me. What formed me was school, art, other people, talking with my friends about changing the world when I was 20 years old.

Mouawad often wonders what kind of man he would have become if he had stayed in Lebanon. Far from considering himself above the fray, he is convinced that he would have been consumed just as the rest of the country was. In 2006 he wrote:

"I belong, as a whole, to all this violence. I look at the land of my father and mother and I see myself, me: I could kill and I could agree with both sides, six sides, twenty sides. I could invade and I could terrorize. I could defend myself and I could resist and to top it all off, if I were one or if I were the other, I would know how to justify each one of my actions, and justify the injustice that fills me, I would find the words with which to express how they slaughter me so, how they remove all possibility for me to live.

Even in his painful fantasies of a life that could have been, Mouawad eventually chooses words as his weapon of choice, but he questions, “If my parents didn’t leave Lebanon, would I be making theater?”

His parents did leave, however, and Mouawad found in the theater an outlet for their silence—and a home for his words. Since the 1990s, he has been dramatizing the experience of first-generation exiles in a series of epic dramas. Forever haunted by what his parents left unsaid, he has tried to create a forum in which ideas, pain, and joy can be shared, because theater has the power to connect people:

On December 7, the A.C.T. community, joined by local luminaries and representatives from several Bay Area arts organizations, came together to celebrate the opening of our new Market Street performance venue, The Costume Shop. Leading the festivities, San Francisco Mayor Ed Lee (pictured, right; photos by Orange Photography) hailed the venture as “a wonderful example of the spirit that has taken hold on Central Market to transform and infuse the area with art, performance, and gathering spaces.”

The event also featured remarks by A.C.T. Artistic Director Carey Perloff, Board of Trustees Chair Nancy Livingston, and Board of Trustees President Rusty Rueff, as well as a rousing musical performance by the A.C.T. Master of Fine Arts Program class of 2013.

In addition to solidifying a storefront presence for A.C.T. in the rapidly developing and artistically vibrant Mid-Market neighborhood, The Costume Shop will enable us to partner with local artists and performing arts companies to present a wide variety of projects, propelling the creation of community-based, transformative new work for years to come.

A bridge is born

It was the Great Depression, and times were hard. Then, in 1933, construction began on the Golden Gate Bridge, and people in the Bay Area had something to celebrate. And celebrate they did. Tens of thousands convened on Crissy Field to usher in a new era for the Bay Area.

On February 23, 1933, a golden spade hit the ground, and work began on what would become a beacon of hope, vision, and tenacity for all the world to admire.

Wells Fargo is honored to help bring the celebrations of the Golden Gate Bridge 75th anniversary to life.

A.C.T.’s Season Gala 2012 . . . Expect the Unexpected

After hearing what Executive Director Ellen Richard had in mind for A.C.T.’s Season Gala, Pattie Rueff couldn’t resist returning as chair of this important event that supports A.C.T.’s conservatory and theater arts education programs. Following last season’s spellbinding gala (which coincided with the opening night performance of the hit musical Armistead Maupin’s Tales of the City and took place in a tented Union Square) will be a tall order, but Rueff is unfazed: “We are totally stepping out of the box with this gala,” she explains. “I decided to chair it because it won’t be your run-of-the-mill fundraiser. It is going to be interactive, fun, and different from anything we’ve ever done before. We need to keep things fresh and new—it’s one of the ways we’ll attract the next generation of theatergoers.”

In that spirit, this year’s gala—appropriately named Expect the Unexpected—will feature an original production written by A.C.T.’s artistic team and starring A.C.T. students, alumni, board members, local personalities, and special guest Darren Criss, an alumnus of A.C.T.’s Young Conservatory, who is currently starring on the hit television series Glee. “Darren Criss is one of the many success stories of the marvelous conservatory the gala supports,” Rueff says.

Darren came to A.C.T. at age 8 and stayed through his senior year of high school, gaining the confidence and the tools he would need to develop a professional career. And what a professional career it is. It’s hard to imagine anyone hotter than him right now—from his role on Glee, to his stellar lead performance on Broadway in How to Succeed in Business Without Really Trying, to the release of his upcoming movie, Imogene, with costar and fellow A.C.T. alumna Annette Bening. But what makes him so special is his desire to give back, and we are so fortunate that he’s fit our gala into his increasingly busy schedule. I don’t think anyone will want to miss this!

The gala will take place on Sunday, April 15, at the newly renovated Regency Center.

Rueff’s leadership and passion are an inspiration to the A.C.T. staff and event-planning committee. With an invaluable background in international meeting planning, Rueff has already either chaired or co-chaired three A.C.T. galas, including the Ruby Jubilee 40th Anniversary Gala, which raised more than a million dollars for our conservatory—far surpassing its goal.

Rueff loves the variety of productions that each A.C.T. season offers: there’s something for everyone. She says, “I like that the plays are not cookie-cutter. A.C.T. takes risks. It’s a bit edgy. But most of all I love the people in this organization. Being near so many creative individuals is very infectious.” Another highlight, she admits, is hobnobbing with our accomplished alumni: “I’m a bit of a groupie!”

In addition to her work with A.C.T., Rueff is active with Peninsula Family Service of San Mateo County and recently finished a two-year term as president of the Hillsborough Auxiliary. She is also the department head for the preschool children’s ministry program at her church. Her husband, Rusty, joined A.C.T.’s board nine years ago and currently serves as its president.

CAREY PERLOFF (Director/Artistic Director) is celebrating her 20th year as artistic director of A.C.T., where she most recently directed The Homecoming, Tosca Café (cocreated with choreographer Val Caniparoli and recently toured Canada), and Racine’s Phèdre. Known for directing innovative productions of classics and championing new writing for the theater, Perloff has also directed for A.C.T. José Rivera’s Boleros for the Disencharmed; the world premieres of Philip Kan Gotanda’s After the War (A.C.T. commission) and her own adaptation (with Paul Walsh) of A Christmas Carol; the American premieres of Tom Stoppard’s The Invention of Love and Indian Ink and Harold Pinter’s Celebration; A.C.T.–commissioned translations/adaptations of Hecuba, The Misanthrope, Enrico W, Mary Stuart, Uncle Vanya, A Mother; and The Voysey Inheritance (adapted by David Mamet); the world premiere of Leslie Ayvazian’s Singer’s Boy; and major revivals of ‘Tis Pity She’s a Whore, The Government Inspector, Happy End (including a critically acclaimed cast album recording), A Doll’s House, Waiting for Godot, The Three Sisters, The Threepenny Opera, Old Times, The Rose Tattoo, Antigone, Creditors, The Room, Home, The Tempest, and Stoppard’s Rock ‘n’ Roll, Traversities, The Real Thing, Night and Day, and Arcadia.

Perloff’s work for A.C.T. also includes Marie Ndiaye’s Hilda, the world premieres of Marc Blitzstein’s No for an Answer and David Lang/Mac Wellman’s The Difficulty of Crossing a Field, and the West Coast premiere of her own play The Colossus of Rhodes (Susan Smith Blackburn Award finalist).

Her play Luminescence Dating premiered in New York at The Ensemble Studio Theatre, was coproduced by A.C.T. and Magic Theatre, and is published by Dramatists Play Service. Her play Waiting for the Flood has received workshops at A.C.T., New York Stage & Film, and Roundabout Theatre Company. Her latest play, Higher, was developed at New York Stage and Film and presented at San Francisco’s Contemporary Jewish Museum in 2010; it won the 2011 Blanche and Irving Foundation Theatre Visions Fund Award and received its world premiere in February 2012 in San Francisco. Her one-act The Morning After was a finalist for the Heideman Award at Actors Theatre of Louisville. Perloff has collaborated as a director on new plays by many notable writers, including Gotanda, Nilo Cruz, and Robert O’Hara. She also recently directed a new Elektra for the Getty Villa in Los Angeles.

Before joining A.C.T., Perloff was artistic director of Classic Stage Company in New York, where she directed the world premiere of Ezra Pound’s Elektra, the American premiere of Pinter’s Mountain Language, and many classic works. Under Perloff’s leadership, CSC won numerous OBIE Awards, including the 1988 OBIE for artistic excellence. In 1993, she directed the world premiere of Steve Reich and Beryl Korot’s opera The Cave at the Vienna Festival and Brooklyn Academy of Music.

A recipient of France’s Chevalier de l’Ordre des Arts et des Lettres and the National Corporate Theatre Fund’s 2007 Artistic Achievement Award, Perloff received a B.A. Phi Beta Kappa in classics and comparative literature from Stanford University and was a Fulbright Fellow at Oxford. She was on the faculty of the Tisch School of the Arts at New York University for seven years and teaches and directs in the A.C.T. Master of Fine Arts Program. She is the proud mother of Lexie and Nicholas.

ELLEN RICHARD (Executive Director) joined A.C.T. as executive director in August 2010. She served previously as executive director of off Broadway’s nonprofit Second Stage Theatre in New York City. During her tenure at Second Stage, she was responsible for the purchase contract of the Helen Hayes Theatre and substantial growth in subscription income and growth in individual giving. Under Richard’s leadership, Second Stage provided the initial home for the Broadway productions Everyday Rapture, Next to Normal, and The Little Dog Laughed.

From 1983 to 2005, Richard enjoyed a rich and varied career with Roundabout Theatre Company. By the time she departed as managing director, Roundabout had been transformed from a small nonprofit on the verge of bankruptcy into one of the country’s largest and most successful theater companies of its kind. Richard is the recipient of six Tony Awards as producer, for Roundabout productions of Cabaret (1998), A View from the Bridge (1998), Side Man (1999), Nine (2003), Assassins (2004), and Glengarry Glen Ross (2005). Producer of more than 125 shows at Roundabout, she had direct supervision of all general and production management, marketing, and financial aspects of the theater’s operations. She conceptualized and oversaw the redesign of the three permanent Roundabout stages—Studio 54, the American Airlines Theatre, and the Harold and Miriam Steinberg Center for Theatre. She directed the location search for Cabaret and supervised the creation of that production’s environmental Kit Kat Klub.

Prior to her tenure at Roundabout, Richard served as business manager of Westport Country Playhouse, theater manager for Stamford Center for the Arts for the Arts, and business manager for Atlas Scenic Studio. She began her career working as a stagehand, sound designer, and scenic artist assistant.

MELISSA SMITH (Conservatory Director) oversees the administration of the A.C.T. Master of Fine Arts Program, Young Conservatory, Summer Training Congress, and Studio A.C.T., in addition to serving as the master acting teacher of the M.F.A. Program. Before joining A.C.T. in 1995, Smith served as director of the program in theater and dance at Princeton University, where she taught acting for six years. She has worked with people of all ages in venues around the country, including teaching in Hawaii and in Florence, Italy. Also a professional actor, she has performed in numerous off-off Broadway plays and at regional theaters, including A.C.T. In 2004 she toured London and Birmingham (U.K.) in Berkeley Repertory Theatre’s production of Continental Divide. Smith holds a B.A. in English and theater from Yale College and an M.F.A. in acting from the Yale School of Drama.

Refreshments
Full bar service, sweets, and savory items are available one hour before the performance in Fred’s Columbia Room on the lower level and the Sky Bar on the third level. You can avoid the long lines at intermission by preordering food and beverages in the lower- and third-level bars. Bar drinks are now permitted in the auditorium.

If your cell phone, pager, or watch alarm are on, please turn them off when you enter the theater. Text messaging during the performance is very disruptive and not allowed.

Listening Systems
Headsets designed to provide clear, amplified sound anywhere in the auditorium are available free of charge in the lobby before performances. Please turn off your hearing aid when using an A.C.T. headset, as it will react to the sound system and make a disruptive noise.

Photographs and recordings of A.C.T. performances are strictly forbidden.

Restrooms
Restrooms are located in Fred’s Columbia Room on the lower level and the Garret on the uppermost level of the theater.
