Shaping the Future of Work

On Trend

It's no secret that the face of the workspace will look dramatically different as we begin our "return-to-office" phase. Office spaces are adapting and beginning to redefine themselves as the best place to bring people together.

Many of us love working from home, but we can't argue that company culture, community and collaboration have been lacking. As roles and workstyles shift, it's important for the workspace to also shift.

At Inscape, our core belief is to create furniture that can change and adapt as you need it to. We want your workspace to be ready for day 2 and even day 2,000 or beyond. We believe that the most sustainable furniture option is one you never have to buy again.

With these core beliefs in mind, we've created Accessory Stack for Inscape Bench. It's forward and backward compatible with your existing Bench frames, worksurfaces and works alongside your existing Bench accessories. It's easier than ever to give your space the privacy but residential feel that's needed for today's office trends.

Spotlight on Design

Rick Flotner
Product Design Manager

Rick Flotner has been a designer at Inscape for 16 years. He is the mind behind some amazing launches like Rockit, as well as cool design trends we're working towards for 2022. Passionate about high function, quality, beauty and unique details, Rick believes every office from corporate giants to hip upstarts deserve fresh workspaces - ones that users can relate to, customize, and incorporate vibes from the east coast to west coast - and everywhere in between.

He believes that we can provide the canvas, and work with local designers, wood workers or artists to provide the paint.

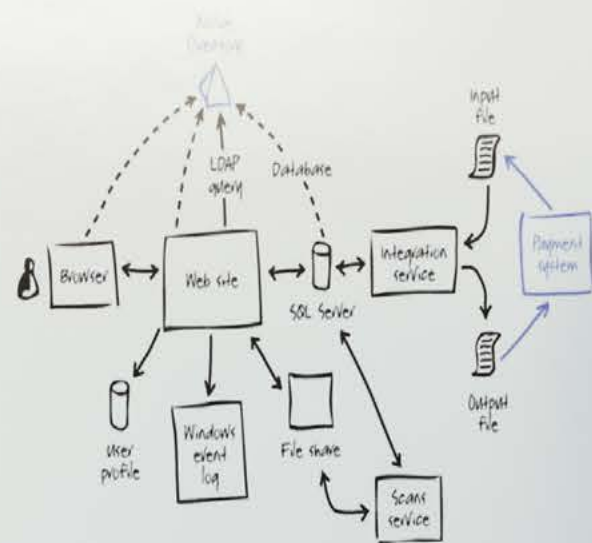

When he's not reimagining the future of work, this busy father of 2 boys is out enjoying the great outdoors and putting some serious kilometers on his bike. Because for him, inspiration can come from anywhere.

Why can't we simply provide the canvas, and let the local designer, wood worker or artist provide the paint?
