2026 Edition

Vega was warm, funny, and full of ideas. Inside Vega lived a tiny volcano. Most days it glowed softly, like a friendly lamp.

On Saturday, Vega built the tallest block tower the living room had ever seen. Every block felt careful. Every block mattered.

Then purple paint splashed across Vega's drawing. Koko did not mean to do it, but Vega's cheeks suddenly felt warm.

Vega waited for a turn with the game. Waiting felt small at first, then bigger, like bubbles rising inside a pot.

At lunch, Vega wanted to explain. But the room was busy, and the words got stuck. The volcano warmed a little more.

Before a volcano erupts, the body gives clues: tight hands, hot face, fast breathing, and a tummy that feels twisty.

Then the tower came down. Blocks flew, Koko froze, and Vega felt the lava rush all the way up.

Juno walked in without knowing the whole story. One small sentence landed on a very hot volcano.

The paint. The waiting. The peas. The tower. All the feelings from the day rose together at once.

Vega's mouth opened. The sentence came close. The volcano was right at the rim.

And then it happened. The big feeling burst out before Vega could stop it.
