THE PLAYWRIGHT

Jon Robin Baitz walks healthily among the living, but in some ways his articulate, carefully constructed plays feel like throwbacks to a more literate, less cynical age. In plays like The Substance of Fire, Three Hotels and The Paris Letter, Baitz maps out tetchy internecine battles of love and loyalty among family, friends and lovers with a comic clarity that evokes Shaw and a fraught psychological texture, thick with explosive secrets and lies, that recalls Ibsen.

Given those antecedents, it’s surprising to note that his career until last year was bookended by two formative L.A. experiences that would seem to belie his plays’ well-made classicism. An L.A. native, Baitz got his first playwriting education from the now-defunct Padua Hills Playwrights Festival, where mavericks like John Steppling and Maria Irene Fornes pushed the form to its extremes, though they also recognized and encouraged Baitz’s distinctive voice. Then, after success as a New York-based playwright, Baitz came back west to create the hit ABC TV drama Brothers & Sisters in 2006, only to be fired after the show’s first season in a welter of mutual recrimination that left him reeling and, as he admits now, “half-mad.”

From the ashes of that defeat came a phoenix called Other Desert Cities, another play about smart, funny people with deadly serious problems, which opened to acclaim off-Broadway in early 2011 and transferred to Broadway that fall, constituting Baitz’s long-overdue Main Stem debut as a proper playwright (his adaptation of Ibsen’s Hedda Gabler came to Broadway in 2001). Though the play isn’t autobiographical, Baitz says he wrote much of his own fired-from-TV frustration into Brooke Wyeth, a nervy novelist who returns to her parents’ Palm Springs home for the holidays bearing a tell-all memoir that could rattle every last skeleton in their closet.

Backed up in part by her barely-sober aunt Silda, Brooke challenges the complacency of her formidable parents — an avuncular film actor, Lyman, and a whip-smart former screenwriter, Polly — Hollywood Republicans who were once close with the Reagans — and butts heads with her reality-TV-producing brother Trip.

In a not-coincidental overlay, the family’s political differences are exacerbated by the timing: the play is set in 2004, just a month after President George W. Bush was reelected and the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan stretched ahead seemingly indefinitely.

Baitz sat down recently in New York to talk about the genesis of the play, his arm’s-length love for his hometown, and his morbid fascination with the Grand Old Party.

The Taper production does feel like a homecoming, doesn’t it?

It does. The Taper’s the theatre I love best, in some way, almost of all theatres. You can’t grow up in L.A. going to the theatre watching Gordon [Davidson] get up at the first preview and tell you you’re seeing something that’s still nascent, that’s still being formed, and not love going back to that theatre.

It was also a very fecund time in L.A. theatre when I was young. The Equity Waiver situation was extraordinary. The Olympic Arts Festival brought so much. There was LATC. So it does feel natural.

I mean also that the play itself is coming home. These characters are, by and large, West Coast creatures. Not Brooke, of course, and I’m not sure about Silda.

Even Silda is, because there’s sort of a dichotomy in the play of East Coast vs. West Coast mores. Brooke carries the East Coast with her into the play, but Silda is in the tradition of people coming out to L.A. to sort of reinvent themselves. It’s no accident that I mention somewhere late in the play that she lived up in Laurel Canyon. I picture a wooded shack on Wonderland Ave. with the dust in the air.

I suppose even Brooke is a recognizable type: Her parents moved west and remade themselves, and raised their kids there. But she rejected that and moved back to the city.

It’s interesting, because my brother and I have both done the same thing. He’s a composer and I’m a playwright, and we both sort of rejected some idea of being comfortable in L.A. — as if L.A. was simply better and even more alive as a notion than as an actual physical presence, that it exerted more reality, almost, as a dream.

I think I could not in fact have written the play from L.A. I had to be in exile. It’s very much a play about exile. The Wyeths have placed themselves, for various reasons, in this scorching, stultifying desert, where everything is sort of in amber, a la 1972 to 1980-something, the best years, the Annenberg/Reagan years. The only one who’s fully embraced the ethos of L.A. is Trip, and he’s found a way to do that by simply being extraordinarily insouciant and accepting the verities and shrugging them off, which I think is essential to being part of what John Steppling would have called the Dream Coast.

I like L.A. as an idea, and I find tremendous beauty in it, whether it’s spending an entire day in the cactus garden at the Huntington Library, or sitting in the Farmer’s Market, or driving to Joshua Tree, or looking at buildings either photographed by Ed Ruscha or painted by David Hockney — such as they are, those that exist still — and I think I’ll probably keep coming back to L.A. as a subject...or the West.

Right, Palm Springs isn’t L.A.; it’s a whole other state of mind.

It is. Palm Springs is about the suspension of all but the mirage. It has a kind of eternally beautiful-and-damned quality about it that I find compelling. Such tremendous beauty, tremendous exhaustion. Retirement in all senses.

When you said “mirage,” I thought of Las Vegas, but that feels more transient, a place designed for tourists. Folks really plant themselves in Palm Springs and live there.

Completely. After my dad retired from Carnation, my parents bought a house in Palm Springs, behind gates, with some tennis courts, with other houses around it, a little community. They would go back and forth between L.A., their little condo off Burton Way, and their little house in Palm Springs.

So I understand the desire to separate yourself from the forces of nature, because the forces of nature in modern urban living are pretty ugly. I think it’s precisely the refusal to admit those forces that makes the place so compelling. The movie theatre in Palm Springs has a collection of Mary Pickford memorabilia in it. There’s a thing called the “Desert Follies,” where old hoofers dance.
That’s in the play. You didn’t make that up?

No, it’s real. And there are sprinklers that spray just this little spritz of water.

We’re talking in September, but this play will open at the Taper after the presidential election. Either way that turns out, do you think this play’s politics are still going to resonate?

I think they will, given the identity confusion within conservative American politics, which is so much a part of the play and so much of my own area of interest — how a party shifts on its axis and becomes something else, while there are these marriages going on between unlikely bedfellows who seem to marry their ideas together in a kind of odd nexus of government interfering in certain parts of your life and not in other parts of your life. These marriages — the glue for a lot of them is a glue that a lot of Republicans are actually quite allergic to, and it’s the glue of hardcore Christianity.

I think the play, without positing a literal, direct political problem, asks how that glue can possibly hold.

But the brand of moderate Republican represented by Polly and Lyman is almost unrecognizable. Apart from Clint Eastwood’s odd convention speech, these people seem absent from the national political stage.

Well, because they have been silenced and kicked out and replaced by Tea Party politicians — and usually, with all possible respect, somewhat illiterate Tea Party politicians who have no sense of macro- or microeconomics, who have no sense of American history or misread it endlessly. So the people in this play are virtually extinct, and they’re in the desert near those dinosaurs at Cabazon.

Do you wish this brand of conservative still held some sway?

Well, I certainly prefer a late-life Barry Goldwater to today’s GOP. I have no brief for Ronald Reagan, given his hatred of unions and his refusal to deal with AIDS, but there is something almost nostalgic about the bonhomie of that time. I suppose I prefer them because there’s less pitchforks-with-God in them.

Polly and Silda are both extremely entertaining, acridly witty characters. Did they ever threaten to run away with the play?

Yes. There are places where Silda occasionally hijacked the play; I’d write pages and pages and you’d just see the play vanishing in the distance, and Silda doing “The Silda Hour.” That’s why one does drafts. I certainly heard them very clearly, Silda and Polly. Restraint is everything, of course, and to let them go unfettered would actually become sort of monotonal.

Do you think about calibrating funny vs. not funny as you write?

It’s all in the service of the narrative. A joke is only useful if it does a lot of other work. And so all of the jokes in the play are either hiding exposition or hiding ways of being complicit or hiding laughter in the dark.

Brooke, on the other hand, seems to be there to dump cold water on everything. She has a lot of fine qualities, but you’re not easy on her.

She’s had a lot of trouble. She’s capable of being funny, but she’s got a lot of scar tissue. And I think her mode is, “I’m here as the artist, I’m here to cause trouble, I’m here to find the truth.”

My characters tell me what they are. And a lot of the way Brooke feels is the way I’ve felt at various times in my life when I’ve been in extremis. She’s a portrait of the artist in despair. And when you’re decompensating, humor is very hard to find, unfortunately.

Your despair came after your painful Brothers & Sisters breakup.

Totally. The Brooke despair was my trying to make sense of having left L.A. the way I did, in personal misery, professional misery — with this kind of hysterical, half-crazy, incredibly self-destructive faux-truth-telling. At the end of the day, telling the truth is perhaps my expensive hobby, you know? For some people it’s horses.

Brooke may represent the artist speaking her truth, but you let the other characters speak a lot of opposing truths back to her.

Listen, I think there’s a danger in being outraged and having self-righteousness to the extent that she does. The certitude is troubling, the sense of entitlement on some level is really very dangerous — the lack of humility, the notion that you can appropriate without consequences, that your moral center is so much more beautiful than everyone else’s. And people lie to themselves, even a recovering depressive who’s just finding her way back. I think sometimes the fear of depression is much worse than depression, and Brooke is in that state; she’s running as fast as she can away from another episode, and she’ll do anything she can.

Her certitude is clearly linked to her mother’s. Brooke has the same disease that her mother has, this sort of absolutism. In her mother’s case, it’s sort of wonderful, because she’ll sort of fight to the death for this family, this cause of hers.

Until that fight doesn’t have any love in it anymore.

Well, love is not necessarily a soft and pleasant thing. I’ve been loved very hard by people.

I’m very conservative when it comes to things like decency, just basic decency. And I guess the play is so simple, on some fundamental level: It argues for humility in the face of what you don’t know, and compassion in the face of what you do know.
