This version of Twilight: Los Angeles, 1992 was first presented at Signature Theatre, Paige Evans, Artistic Director; Harold Wolpert Executive Director.

A version of Twilight: Los Angeles, 1992 was created for a touring production of the play at the Berkeley Repertory Theatre, Sharon Ott, Artistic Director; Susan Medak, Managing Director.

In its original form Twilight: Los Angeles, 1992 was commissioned and originally produced by Center Theatre Group/Mark Taper Forum in Los Angeles, Gordon Davidson, Artistic Director/Producer, directed by Emily Mann. It premiered on May 23, 1993, and closed on July 18, 1993. It was subsequently produced as a work-in-progress at The McCarter Theatre in Princeton, New Jersey.

The original New York production of Twilight: Los Angeles, 1992, opened at the Public Theater in March 1994, directed and produced by George C. Wolfe. It opened on Broadway at the Cort Theatre on April 17, 1994. The producers were: Benjamin Mordecai, Laura Rafary, Ric Wanetik, the Public Theater (George C. Wolfe, Producer) and the Mark Taper Forum (Gordon Davidson, Artistic Director), in association with Harrier Newman Leve, Jeanne Rizzo, James D. Stern, Daryl Roth, Jo-Lynne Worley, Ronald A. Pizzuti, The Booking Office, Inc. and Freddy Bienstock.

FROM THE PLAYWRIGHT

What Happened?
By Anna Deavere Smith

The first performance of my play Fires in the Mirror at the Public Theater in New York about a 1991 race riot in Brooklyn was cancelled because the Los Angeles riots/social explosion/uprising/revolution, as it was variously called, had rocked the nation the night before. I actually think Fires... was a hit in part because of what happened in L.A. Americans pay little attention to race unless there’s a catastrophic event that brings it into consciousness.

Gordon Davidson came to see Fires. The experience of seeing the play evoked memories for him of The Trial of the Catonsville Nine, which he had directed in the 1970s at the Taper and on Broadway. He invited me to have breakfast, and, at a restaurant in the Algonquin Hotel of all places, we decided I should come to Los Angeles to apply my process of making plays out of interviews, exploring sometimes opposing points of view.

When I arrived in L.A., at the first planning meeting, Gordon reached his hand inside his breast pocket, as gentlemen did in those days, and took out a “buck slip” (before cellphones, folks who could make things happen carried carried stationery the size of a dollar in the breast pockets of their suits to make notes). “What do you need?” He asked, as he poised his pen. Until then, conversations about my work in theatre and academia were limited to “Here’s what you get.”

The list Gordon jotted on his buck slip became the blueprint for how I create cultures of work to this very day. He and a large team at the Taper pushed an extraordinary number of logistics forward, even as the city was still unsettled. Many of you reading this program note may have forgotten (or are too young to know or were not even born at the time) that, for example, there were actually two trials. President Bush Sr. ordered a second trial. The city was on pins and needles that if that jury still came back with all not guilty verdicts that there would be another riot.

The city was full of factions. In fact, I had to begin every interview by asking, “What do you call what happened here?” If I called it a riot, and the interviewee considered it a revolution, my misnaming it could cost me the interview. People were on edge. So, foremost in my mind was the need for a multicultural brain trust. In the early ’90s, the limits within which we discussed race were confined to a Black-white paradigm. Dramatization of the social explosion in Los Angeles called for more than that. First on my list of needs was to put together a circle of individuals from different communities who listened well, read deeply, and analyzed the world in front of us with a mixture of keen scrutiny and hope. What we now call EDI is not enough if there’s no support for a space in which we reckon with the failure of and betrayals of language. As I held my breath, I was relieved that Gordon gave no push back to funding this brain trust and immediately started jotting names.

Number one on the list was Dorinne Kondo, an anthropologist, an Americanist, and scholar of Asian American studies (heavy on the scrutiny). I also needed someone to take me around the Latino community. Enter Héctor Tobar, a young, energetic, Pulitzer Prize-winning reporter from the Los Angeles Times, who is now a novelist (heavy on the hope). I also asked Gordon to include

Elizabeth Alexander, an African American poet and scholar, now President of the Mellon Foundation. The dynamic conversations between these three individuals, two of whom were relatively new to the theatre, should have been filmed. The conversations were often explosively emotional, but guess what? Everyone came to the work with good intentions and a common purpose: to tell the complicated story of what happened in Los Angeles in the aftermath of the shocking not guilty verdicts delivered in the trial of four police officers who beat motorist Rodney King. The beating had been captured on videotape, and the world saw one of the first visual evidences of police brutality. Everyone who watched the riot burst before them or who were directly affected by the riot had a story. No one had the story. No one person has the story of race in America. There is no one American story.

Though I am not involved in this production, other than to make a few adjustments to the text (I revised it so that the play could be performed by five actors after the murder of George Floyd), I was invited to the first rehearsal here in L.A. Kishisa Jefferson Ross—my assistant, driver, Sancho Panza of thirty years ago—showed up holding a thick black binder. With no Google Maps, just a Thomas Guide and a daily expanding list of interviewees secured under the leadership of producer Corey Madden, Kishisa and I travelled the massive landscape of Los Angeles and its surrounding areas. In looking at our schedule in the binder, I noted that we never stopped for lunch. Kishisa had the sense to bring food for herself. I survived on 10oz bottles of Martinelli’s apple juice when we could find cold ones.

With braces on her teeth and an angelic smile, Kishisa looked like the picture of innocence. I suspect that Kishisa, having grown up in South Central, had a lot to say, but she kept most of it to herself. She even kept quiet when she accompanied me to an interview with Daryl Gates, recently deposed from his throne as treacherous Police Chief. We met him at a radio station, and I interviewed him as he stood at a Xerox machine. Feral in his attitude, he did not sit down. Years later, Gates came over to me in a restaurant and told me his decision to hold the police during the riots was the biggest mistake of his life—it cost him his marriage, his career, his legacy. Kishisa’s professional silence was of particular value to the project. After all, my goal was to hear from everyone.

Etched in my mind is the time that Kishisa and I got out of the car at Nickerson Gardens and proceeded to trek towards an interview. A fantastic-looking brother approached us. Even if Kishisa looked like she knew her way around, I did not, in my uniform: a Brooks Brothers skirt, linen jacket, and respectable flats. “What are y’all doing here?” he asked. I explained that we had an appointment at Nickerson Gardens. He said something to the effect of “Let me walk y’all over there. Y’all don’t belong walkin’ around here alone!”

One day, most likely on Kishisa’s brick-sized mobile phone (mobile phones were not common), we got a call from two Korean American UCLA graduate students, Kathryn Cho and Nancy Yoo. I recall them introducing themselves over the phone, saying that they heard what I was doing, and they were sure I was going “to get it wrong.” Immediately, I felt as if they were going to run me out of town—their town. What followed was the opposite. Kathryn and Nancy offered to help me. They escorted me around “their” world, introducing me to Korean Americans affected by the uprising, translating for me, getting doors to open that never would have opened without their help. Kathryn and her father invited me to worship with them one Sunday morning at their church in Koreatown. I will never forget its huge orchestra with a large string section. The contrast with music at First African American Methodist Episcopal—rousing gospel music but actually praising the same spirit—was powerful. I contacted Kathryn (now Yoon) recently, thanks to Facebook. She asked me during our phone call if I remembered that she and her father came to see Twilight: Los Angeles, 1992 and that her father brought flowers to me backstage. It was a gesture of grace—one that was natural, I am sure, for Dr. Cho (a dentist). I certainly do remember it.

The photographer Mary Ellen Mark wrote in the preface to the catalogue for her An American Odyssey that the camera provided her with the “necessary distance for getting close to strangers.” That’s what the tape recorder has provided for me. My journey is an existential one, as well as an artistic project. I have been trying to get close to America in spite of its many forms of segregation and its systems of dehumanization that line its history and its present, sometimes in the name of justice. The not guilty verdicts had been—even for Angelenos who’d thought of the police as protectors of their property—eye-opening. How could this happen in our country? As Bryan Stevenson has explained, and exemplified with his monumental lynching memorial, we are a post-genocidal society. The rampage against Native Americans was a bloody birth to our nation. And so, the betterment of society project has actually accompanied the darker moments in our history. We are not unique, and our times are not unprecedented. Our history is lined with that which was wrong, but it’s also lined with those who applied active vigilance and commitment to righting wrongs.

Even the prosecutor in the Simi Valley trial could not have imagined that Officers Koon, Powell, Briseno, and Wind would actually walk. Acknowledging his underestimation of the multiple realities in our midst, he told me that he’d thought the guilty verdict was going to be a “slam dunk.”

Gordon and the staff at the Taper put an extraordinary amount of institutional commitment and muscle behind the project. Police Commissioner Stanley Sheinbaum, a friend of Gordon’s, so believed in the project that he met with me in London in the early days of putting it together and told me he was personally writing a check for $10,000—the first donation. The Taper and their friends gave me the opportunity to hear the shouts and whispers of this city. The people of Los Angeles were tangled in a crisis, but their beautiful and mesmerizing words flowed forward every single time I pushed the button on my Sony cassette recorder and asked one simple, but always provocative, question: “What happened?”
Timeline: March 3rd, 1991—April 17th, 1993

Twilight: Los Angeles, 1992 follows the stories of many real-life Los Angeles residents during the L.A. Uprising in 1992. While there were many underlying and systemic socio-economic issues that contributed to the uprising, the event began as a direct response to the acquittal of four police officers that beat Rodney G. King, a Black man, the year prior. This is a timeline of the events surrounding the King case and the uprising that followed.

MARCH 4th, 1991: Holliday sells video of King beating to KTLA. Video is distributed to CNN and other stations. Viewers around the globe witness the beating.

MARCH 7th, 1991: King is released after the district attorney’s office announces there is not enough evidence to file criminal charges.

MARCH 26th, 1991: The four police officers charged in the King beating plead not guilty and Du is arraigned on one count of murder.

MARCH 28th, 1991: Records show that $11.3 million was paid by the city of Los Angeles in 1990 to resolve police abuse cases. This, combined with Police Chief Daryl F. Gates calling the King beating an “aberration,” starts calls for his resignation.

MAY 7th, 1991: Gates takes disciplinary action against the four criminally charged officers, firing probationary officer Timothy Wind and suspends the other three without pay.

MAY 10th, 1991: A Grand Jury decides not to indict any of the 17 officers who were present at the King beating but did not participate.

JULY 23rd, 1991: State appeals court orders the trial of the four LAPD officers to be moved out of L.A. County due to publicity and political fallout.

AUGUST 3rd, 1991: A sheriff’s deputy fatally shoots 19-year-old Latino Arturo (Smokey) Jimenez in Ramona Gardens housing project in East L.A., touching off civil disturbance involving 300 residents.

OCTOBER 11th, 1991: Du is found guilty of voluntary manslaughter, and is later sentenced to five years probation, 400 hours of community service, and a $500 fine.

NOVEMBER 29th, 1991: LAPD officers fatally shoot Henry Peco, a 28-year-old Black man, starting a standoff with over 100 residents of the Imperial Court housing project in Watts.
MARCH 3rd, 1992: Twelve jurors are selected for the trial of the four LAPD officers involved in the King beating. None are African American.

APRIL 3rd, 1992: Officer Briseno testifies that King never posed a threat to LAPD officers.

APRIL 16th, 1992: Willie L. Williams is named to succeed Gates.

APRIL 29th, 1992: Jury returns “not guilty” verdicts on all charges of the LAPD officers in the King beating except one count of excessive force from Officer Powell. A mistrial is declared on that count alone.

Over 2,000 people gather for a peaceful protest at First AME Church in South Los Angeles.

Violence begins to spread. Police dispatchers begin to relay reports of head wounds, vandalism, and burglary in an ever-widening radius.

Reginald Denny is yanked from his truck cab and beaten unconscious at Florence and Normandie.

Mayor Tom Bradley declares a local emergency; Governor Pete Wilson calls out the National Guard.

APRIL 30th, 1992: Three new fires per minute are reported.

Bradley imposed a curfew for the entire city, restricting the sale of gasoline and banning the sale of ammunition.

The Justice Department announced it will resume investigation into possible civil rights violations in the King beating.

MAY 2nd, 1992: 30,000 people march through Koreatown in support of beleaguered merchants, calling for peace between the Korean American and Black communities.

President George Bush Sr. declares Los Angeles a disaster area.

MAY 3rd, 1992: L.A. Times reports 58 deaths; 2,383 injuries; over 7,000 fire responses; 12,111 arrests; and 3,100 damaged businesses.

APRIL 17th, 1993: Officers Briseno and Wind are acquitted. Officer Powell and Sgt. Stacey Koon are found guilty of violating King’s civil rights.

Reexamine, Reason, Reflect
By Gregg T. Daniel

I recall standing on a rooftop in April 1992 where I was privy to a 360-degree view of Los Angeles. In any direction I turned, I witnessed black smoke rising up from a multitude of locations. The catalyst for the civic unrest was the announcement of the acquittal of four Police Officers by a Simi Valley Jury in the 1992 beating of an African American man, Rodney King. The verdict plunged Los Angeles into approximately six days of social conflict.

Anna Deavere Smith chose to listen to the voices of those Los Angeles denizens and create an unusual, uniquely compelling, work of theatre. In reexamining the play, I knew I wanted to align my vision with Smith’s undaunted gaze in interviewing her subjects. Let them tell their own story, offer them the space to speak their own truths, if one listens closely, their words have the ability to uplift, confuse, proclaim, challenge, and paint a portrait of who they are in relation to a city they often find themselves at odds with.

What does Twilight: Los Angeles, 1992 reveal about who we were as a nation during the unrest of 1992 and where we currently are as a society? Clearly, the work can be viewed through a historical lens; however, it is a history which continues to doggedly repeat itself as we continue to bear witness to acts of horrifying brutality and violence perpetrated on Black and Brown bodies.

In opening up the play to a team of five diverse actors, issues and themes of portraying race, gender, class, and ethnicity collide. In keeping with the integrity of Smith’s chameleon-like approach seen thirty years earlier inhabiting the play’s multitude of characters, I reasoned it was the company’s obligation to be respectful of the various individuals and communities presented here while acknowledging the inadequacy of representing “everyone.” Representation matters. One of the challenges of directing this new version of Twilight: Los Angeles, 1992, is choosing five actors to represent our city. My goal in the casting process was to build an ensemble of excellent local actors who could bring the people, stories, and cultures represented in Twilight: Los Angeles, 1992 to vivid life, using both their lived experience and artistic skill. I am aware that the actors will be representing genders, ages, abilities, perspectives, and cultures other than their own. I believe the actors I have chosen are capable of doing this with humility, respect, artistry, and empathy. Our shared purpose is in telling this vital story with boldness, attentiveness and care.

Los Angeles continues to be a city which holds immense contradictions, poverty, pain, and suffering, boundless creativity, affluence, and reward.

Smith offers no easy solutions, no epiphanic moments in the work, just a fair, stark representation of individuals caught in a historic moment in our city. I hope you consider where you stand in relation to these events, look back but also look forward as a member of a community of people who must continue to find a way to share our city together.

DORINNE KONDO (Dramaturgy) is Professor of American Studies and Anthropology and former Director of Asian American Studies at the University of Southern California. A cultural anthropologist, theatre and performance studies scholar, playwright, and dramaturg, Kondo has authored the prize-winning books Crafting Selves: Power, Gender and Discourses of Identity in a Japanese Workplace, and About Face: Performing Race in Fashion and Theater. Her latest book, Worldmaking: Race, Performance and the Work of Creativity, analyzes race and power in the theatre industry, including chapters on Smith and the creative process during the world premiere of Twilight... in 1993. The book includes her play Seamless, about the emotional afterlives of Japanese American incarceration in generations born after the camps. Kondo’s comedy But Can He Dance? was produced at Asian American Repertory Theater in San Diego. She has served as a dramaturg for three plays by Anna Deavere Smith: Twilight..., House Arrest (workshops, Arena Stage and Mark Taper Forum), and Let Me Down
I’m deeply moved to be back at the Taper to revisit Twilight... thirty years later with this new version of the play. The show’s themes remain all too urgent given the new/old iterations of settler colonialism, white supremacy, the structural inequalities of race/ class/ citizenship, and gendered/ racialized violence that still shape our historical moment. I hope that Twilight... can help us to face our power-laden histories, to unleash our imaginations to think beyond our world of punishment and structural violence—and to mobilize for social transformation.

Twilight: Los Angeles, 1992 spent the first week of rehearsal at the historic headquarters of the Watts Labor Community Action Committee (WLCAC). The city of Watts is both directly tied to the L.A. Uprising and a hub of community action, protest, and advocacy since the 1960s.

WLCAC was founded in 1965 by Ted Watkins, who fled from a lynch mob in Mississippi to Los Angeles as a teenager in the 1920s. Early activities included neighborhood cleanups, youth jobs, senior meals, agriculture, housing, and multiple local businesses. In 1971, WLCAC purchased a seven-acre tire retreading factory, converting it from a polluting industrial site into a community and shopping center, with headquarters for programs that served thousands and housed hundreds of Watts residents. It featured a home improvement store and the area’s only toy store. In 1992, during the L.A. Uprising, Ted’s life work was burned to the ground. The organization rebuilt the physical structure of the center, adding spaces for community gatherings, theatre, and an immersive educational tour about the history of racism and the Civil Rights movement with replicas of a slave hold and Reconstruction Era dwelling.

“I get to walk into a space where Black people are celebrated and that’s beautiful to me...It just makes me proud and happy about coming to work.” In rebuilding the organization’s physical home, the organization restructured its focus and mission as well. The WLCAC now focuses on recreation, healing, and housing programs—both on the property and off. It is still run by the founder’s family—President/CEO Timothy Watkins—who was interviewed for the original production of Twilight... thirty years ago. His daughter, Tina Watkins Quaye, leads the grant writing department, but is also a historian of the space and organization. Quaye led the cast and creatives on a tour through the WLCAC on the first day of rehearsal.

“There’s something sacred about being connected as human beings and knowing that...in some way we are all affected [by the L.A. Uprising] because the remnants of disinvestment in Watts are still here. So, bringing [Twilight...] to a building that was resurrected after that ruin and having a platform to tell the stories of people who were directly impacted is so special,” Quaye said.

Rehearsals took place in the Phoenix Hall theatre. The symbolism was not lost on Twilight...Actor Hugo Armstrong. “This is a place that literally burned to the ground and the Phoenix rises and continues to rise,” he said. He felt it was a testament to the resilience of humans and the ways they can become better over time.

“The fact that [WLCAC] welcomes us is a form of radical hospitality I wish more places had. That’s what I feel in the spirit of this place.”

-Twilight: Los Angeles, 1992 Playwright Anna Deavere Smith
The program is designed to foster important voices, inspire playwrights to create their best work, encourage bold writing, and build relationships among local playwrights, Center Theatre Group, and the L.A. theatre community. Our growing community currently contains more than 100 playwrights. A new cohort of playwrights will be announced soon. Learn more at CTG.org/Artists.
