Clean Energy Tech (CETY) Spiking +200% After CEO Letter to Shareholders

Steve Kanaval | Tuesday, 12 February 2019 09:29 (EST)

Usually, you have to dig to understand what companies do, and how they do it, to determine why the stock price rallies or falls. I was searching the LDMicro site to find the movers from Monday, and clicked straight through to the January 30, 2019 letter to shareholders from CEO Kam Mahdi of Clean Energy Technologies, Inc. (CETY:TO) - $0.08785 (+0.025875 (41.73%)).

It was refreshing because he listed clearly and succinctly what the company did, where it was going and why. Very clean. His share price reflected this in volume, which increased 20x as the share price jumped 200% to start the week with large blocks of stock changing hands during the noon hour in the Monday session.

I noted the large block trades in time and sales with shares rising from the $0.03 level and the closing hour shares were trading at $0.06. Keep in mind, trading had been relatively dormant, so the shock to those who trade it day-to-day was apparent. Often in these cases, when you have runaway pricing on a percentage basis, you get irrational price action, but shares of CETY held in there. It will be interesting to see where prices are supported after the run up yesterday.

My guess is we get some sort of retracement back to $0.04, and we important if you trade these stocks. Since most microcap investors initiate positions in these stocks trading from the long side, you get price moves like that which occurred here in CETY.

Historically, this happens in stocks like this where you have a "fat tail" event in which the volume has a 20x spike taking share price with it. Time will tell if this was short covering, new buying or a simple spike in prices. I don't think the momentum (algo) traders really care, I think they move from symbol to symbol and have an on-to-the-next-trade mentality which is more about AI than it is about intuitive investing in undervalued shares with a strong fundamental story. So, it's hard to block out the noise when investing in Q1 2019.

I like the fact that I can scroll quickly and get some metrics and connect the dots between fundamental fence posts and blocks of stocks changing hands. I think this happens when you have a CEO who cares about communicating with shareholders. Some of the best C-Levels executives don't look at stock price intraday or even interday, and rather focus on running the company for the long haul. They recognize that their job is to manage the company, and that trying to manage the stock price is a fool's errand - what a refreshing approach to investing.
