In the year 1986, according to USA Today, Jon Hughes alongside Director Howard Deutch made movie magic in the form of "Pretty In Pink." The film follows Andie, played by Molly Ringwald, your average high schooler who is trying to navigate life alongside her bestie, Duckie. Being nerds is what Andie and Duckie do best. However, social limitations do not stop Andie from falling for the popular guy in her school, Blane. Much like most 80's movies, Blane is not just popular, he is an entitled country club kid with douchebag friends in tow. As movie magic occurs, he eventually takes notice of Andie and starts pursuing her much to his stuck-up friends' chagrin, per Den of Geek.

Make way for a Mondrian

The Mondrian painting adds so much character to Andie's because it translates into the world of interior decor. Mondrian combined primary colors with ease against neutrals on a canvas using oil paint to create a satisfying result. This is in fact, a complementary decor technique that decorators achieve by juxtaposing primary colors against neutral tones within a room, such that it elicits a calming response from the homeowner. Eddie Maestri of the Dallas-based interior design and architecture firm Maestri Studio spoke to BHG, confirming this. He says, "I like to pair them (primary colors) with calmer, more subdued color tones, such as white, gray, and browns," as a way to tone the primary colors down. The Mondrian poster has all Maestri's aforementioned aesthetics: It boasts primary colors — red, yellow, and blue splashed against a "more subdued color tone" which is the white background that carries all the colors. If you have a vacant wall in your home you should highly consider getting a Mondrian poster immediately. Luckily online stores like Junique currently stock a few options so it can be yours with the click of a button.
