Welcome Area & Reception

Conveying strong fiscal responsibility and community trust is imperative in public sector spaces. Government office welcome areas not only constitute the first point of contact between employees and visitors, they also serve as inviting environments for all citizens to work, communicate, and decompress

The latest research shows: when government agencies offer a better customer experience, they deliver measurable impact across multiple priorities.

– McKinsey & Company

Private Office Spaces

Discretion and functionality are two of the most important attributes of a solitary space – these environments deserve solutions designed for fine-tuned focus, comprehensive organization, and reliable privacy.

There are incredible efficiency gains when you are actually designing for the jobs that people are doing, as opposed to designing for a list of requirements.

– Marcy Jacobs, associate partner for McKinsey & Company

Administration and Office Spaces

Office environments demand a diplomatic balance of discreet private spaces and collaborative open areas that offer smart, streamlined workflow and customized connection

For those employees who are in the office, the goal is to provide comfort and safety at every level and to make employees feel relaxed, as if they were at home.

– Parterre

Meeting Spaces

Whether it's a policy-making mission or one-on-one collaboration, sensible shared environments require highly functional seating and worksurfaces designed to support big decisions and shared goals.

Flexibility around how, where, and when people work is no longer a differentiator, it's now table stakes. In the U.S., employees expect flexibility within their job as much as they expect a 401(k).

– Harvard Business Review

Training Spaces

Agile environments are essential for developing and training tomorrow's leaders – flexible spaces supported by solutions that offer instant mobility, all-encompassing comfort, and straightforward design and functionality.

Common and Breakroom Spaces

Diligent, heads-down focus is imperative to highly productive government spaces, but everyone – no matter how conscientious – needs a break occasionally. Breathable environments with natural light, pops of color, and solutions designed to administer comfort and support make all the difference in a busy workday.
