Median rent drifted lower from its July peak but remained near record levels.

Median and average rent rose year over year to their third-highest level on record after the market peaked in July. The median rent was $4,095, up 18.7% annually and 2.1% higher than the previous month. Average rent rose 19% year over year to $5,249 but slipped 3.4% from the prior month, pulled lower by the weaker performance of the luxury market. After several months of reaching new highs, the luxury median and average rent, representing the top ten percent of all rentals, declined month over month by 11.5% and 9.3%, respectively. Net effective median rent, median rent, less landlord concessions,

Prepared by Miller Samuel Real Estate Appraisers & Consultants

was $4,033, the third highest on record, and climbed above the $4,000 threshold for the first time in two months after peaking at $4,150 in July. The net effective median rent was 15.2% higher than the same month just before the pandemic.

Note: Our research efforts pivoted to a new and robust listing system that enabled us to pull more rental inventory into all three rental markets reported in this report. As a result, listing inventory and the vacancy rate were restated in December 2020.*
