Weill composed The Threepenny Opera in 1928, and the first performance took place on August 31 of that year in Berlin. It hit audiences with a force comparable to that with which the original Beggar’s Opera captivated London exactly two centuries earlier. Brecht missed no opportunity of showing his prosperous bourgeois audience how alike were Gay’s London and contemporary Berlin, that fascinating hub of extraordinary cultural vitality, its National Socialist undercurrents studiously ignored for the time being, but so soon as to send Brecht, Weill, Klemperer and many others into exile.

Otto Klemperer, who had gone to see The Threepenny Opera ten times, commissioned a concert suite for wind ensemble—an orchestra sans strings—which the composer called Little Threepenny Music. This version, which we hear tonight, was first performed under Klemperer’s direction at the Berlin State Opera on February 7, 1929.

THE STORY
The principal characters in The Threepenny Opera are Jonathan Jeremiah Peachum, who is in the business of outfitting the poor in rags designed to melt the hearts of potential donors of alms; his wife, Celia; their daughter Polly; Macheath, murderer and adroit chief of a gang of street-robbers, and Polly’s lover; Tiger Brown, chief of police and excellent at not looking where it pays not to look; and Jenny, a prostitute with fantasies of vengeance. In due course, Macheath is betrayed by the prostitutes from whom he cannot stay away. Even Tiger Brown is helpless to rescue him, and he is condemned to death, unable to bribe himself out of death row.

But the tale has a happy ending: a royal messenger arrives on horseback with news that the Queen has pardoned Macheath, raised him to the peerage, and gifted him with a castle and an annual pension of £10,000 for life. In a last reprise of the famous Mack the Knife life. In a last reprise of the famous Mack the Knife, a two-for-one deal that combines the famous ballad singer/master of ceremonies/narrator tells us “if necessary cash is on hand, all usually ends well” and, as the curtain falls, reminds us that “some are in darkness and some are in the light. And you see those who are in the light, but never the ones in the dark.”

THE MUSIC
The Little Threepenny Music begins with the Overture, described by German musicologist Theodor Adorno as a “Handel Overture from the perspective of an all-night café.” Next comes the murder-ballad, The Moritat of Mack the Knife, a two-for-one deal that combines the famous tune with Peachum’s Song of the Inadequacy of Human Striving. The two songs are cousins: the same tempo fits both, and the musical cells from which they grow are related. Here and throughout, Weill sets dismaying texts and sentiments to most agreeable music.

In their Instead-Of Song, the elder Peachums complain about the young—that instead of doing something sensible they want fun and that they sink into that “darned ‘See the moon over Soho?’ and ‘Can you feel my heart beating?’” and “I’ll follow you to the ends of the earth, Johnny’ mode.” These clichés offer great moments for the trumpet and the saxophones.

The point of the Ballad of the Easy Life is that only the prosperous live well: “Stay away from me with your stories of great spirits content to live with a book, but nothing in their bellies.” In Polly’s Song, Miss Peachum laments that her lover has abandoned her. The melody is one of Weill’s sweetest, and he follows it with the beautiful closing phrase of Macheath and Polly’s love duet: “Love lasts, or it doesn’t, here or there.” In the sensual Tango-Ballad Macheath and Jenny reminisce about the days, so happy in retrospect, when they kept house together. In the Cannon Song Macheath and Police Chief Tiger Brown recall their army days.

For the Threepenny Finale, Weill omits the bright part of the opera’s conclusion, concentrating on the muted and dark music as the terrified Macheath sits in jail, awaiting execution. The chorale is led by Mr. Peachum: “Don’t persecute injustice too much, for it is cold and will freeze to death on its own. Think about the dark and the great chill that reigns in this vale of tears.” And so, having begun with pseudo-Handel, Weill ends with pseudo-Bach.

Instrumentation: 2 flutes (doubling piccolo), 2 clarinets, alto saxophone, tenor saxophone (doubling soprano saxophone), 2 bassoons, 2 trumpets, trombone, tuba, banjo, guitar, small accordion, timpani, snare drum, tenor drum, bass drum, cymbals, tom-tom, triangle, wood block, glockenspiel and piano

MAURICE RAVEL
B: March 7, 1875
Ciboure, France
D: December 28, 1937
Paris, France

Concerto in G major for Piano and Orchestra
PREMIERED: January 14, 1932

Maurice Ravel was 54 before he wrote any concertos, and then, in the fall of 1929, he set to work simultaneously on two. His Piano Concerto for the Left Hand, dark and serious, was for the pianist Paul Wittgenstein, and the other, the much lighter Piano Concerto in G major, was intended for the composer’s own use. But by the fall of 1931, when the G-major Concerto was complete, failing health prevented the composer from performing this music himself. Instead, he conducted the premiere in Paris on January 14, 1932; the pianist was Marguerite Long, to whom Ravel dedicated the concerto, and who had also given the first performance of Ravel’s Le Tombeau de Couperin in 1919.

BRILLIANT, TRANSPARENT AND SULTRY
Ravel described this work as “written in the spirit of Mozart and Saint-Saëns,” but listeners would hardly make those associations. What strikes audiences first are the concerto’s virtuoso writing for both piano and orchestra, the brilliance and transparency of the music, and the influence of American jazz. It is possible to make too much of the jazz influence, but Ravel had heard jazz during his tour of America in 1928 and found much to admire. When asked about its influence on this concerto, he said: “It includes some elements borrowed from jazz, but only in moderation.” Ravel was quite proud of this music and said that in it, he had expressed his thoughts as he had wished.

ALLEGRAMENTE. The first movement opens with a whipcrack, and immediately the piccolo plays the jaunty opening tune, picked up in turn by solo trumpet before the piano makes its sultry solo entrance. Some of the concerto’s most brilliant music occurs in this movement, which is possessed of a sort of madcap energy, with great splashes of instrumental color, strident flutter-tonguing by the winds, string glissandos and a quasi-cadenza for the harp.

ADAGIO ASSAI. In a three-minute solo that opens the Adagio assai, one of Ravel’s most beautiful slow movements, the pianist lays out at length the haunting main theme, which later returns to great effect with the English horn heard over delicate piano accompaniment. Despite its seemingly easy flow of melody, this movement gave Ravel trouble, and he later said that he wrote it “two bars at a time.”

PRESTO. The finale explodes to life with a five-note riff that recurs throughout, functioning somewhat like the ritornello of the Baroque concerto. The jazz influence shows up here in the squealing clarinets, brass smears and racing piano passages. The movement comes to a sizzling conclusion on the phrase with which it began.

Instrumentation: solo piano with orchestra comprising flute, piccolo, oboe, English horn, clarinet, E-flat clarinet, 2 bassoons, 2 horns, trumpet, trombone, timpani, snare drum, bass drum, cymbals, slap stick, tam-tam, triangle, wood block, harp and strings

SHOWCASE SUMMER 2024  MINNESOTA ORCHESTRA  27
In much music by the Frenchman Francis Poulenc, we hear a deep religiosity—but it was a mischievous streak that first brought him fame with Les Biches—the ballet unveiled at Monte Carlo on January 6, 1924, by Diaghilev’s Ballet Russes. It marked a turning point in the composer’s career, and he wrote three more ballets and a comic opera. The theater, along with the Catholic Church, were the foundational elements of this contradictory Parisian. In both sacred and secular music, Poulenc projected every ounce of his personality, from the droll and roguish to the pious and sincere.

A LESS TROUBLESOME REBEL

Poulenc was born in 1899, on the threshold of a new century, and he turned out to be one of its less troublesome rebels. He was born to a wealthy family that nurtured his infatuation with music and the theater; his mother was a pianist who had studied with a pupil of Franz Liszt. Poulenc’s ideal was Igor Stravinsky, and after serving in World War I, he aligned himself with a group of progressive French composers dubbed “The Six.” In the words of their spokesman Jean Cocteau, they were reacting to music of the kind one listens with one’s head in one’s hands.

In addition to Poulenc, the circle included Georges Auric, Louis Durey, Arthur Honegger, Germaine Tailleferre and Darius Milhaud, who recalled of their meeting with Parisian poets and artists: “Many fruitful artistic collaborations may be traced back to these gatherings, and also certain works illustrating what amounted to the new music-hall aesthetic.” What they rejected was the supercharged romanticism of Richard Wagner and the Germans as well as the hedonism of Claude Debussy, and they were not averse to absorbing popular idioms in their music, as you will hear in the saucy suite from Les Biches. This was the age of Arnold Schoenberg and his pioneering atonal aesthetic, but a composer such as Poulenc never wavered from his commitment to traditional diatonic music.

THE COMPOSER’S BREAKTHROUGH

The big change for Poulenc came in 1923 when the impresario Serge Diaghilev asked him to collaborate on a production with the painter Marie Laurencin. There would be no plot. What Diaghilev wanted was an “atmospheric ballet” in which 16 young girls (the “does” of the title Les Biches, French slang for coquettes) are gathered in a pure white salon dominated by a single piece of furniture—a large, blue, provocative couch. Enter three handsome young men in bathing suits—for it is a warm summer afternoon—and subtle innuendos begin. The premiere production of Les Biches at Monte Carlo was a triumph, and Poulenc, hitherto a composer of songs, moved into larger forms.

Though Les Biches was Poulenc’s first orchestral work, it reveals a composer with a sophisticated ear for instrumental color. Between May 1939 and the following January he completely reorchestrated the score, retaining the tonal palette of the original with all its solo work. Five numbers of the complete ballet were selected for the concert suite; the overture and three choral songs were omitted.

SPIRITED RONDEAU TO JOYOUS FINALE

RONDEAU. The curtain parts upon a shrill call that passes from piccolo to oboe to clarinets before the brassy, syncopated Rondeau tune takes wing. The exuberance does not diminish even when it slips into the minor mode, focusing on low winds and horns. Themes are playfully volleyed about the orchestra. A tender interlude, marked Très calme, offers brief respite in mellow chords. Reminiscent of circus music, a snare drum bristles at the cadence.

ADAGIETTO. A solo oboe sets the lyrical mood of the Adagietto, surely a pas de deux; the caressing melody is equally at ease in the trumpet and the other instruments to which it migrates. In these bright strokes of Poulenc’s orchestration resides the fascination of the work.

RAG–MAZURKA. There is even more to the Rag–Mazurka than its entertaining title suggests. Cast in a brisk 3/8 meter, it sounds like a whirling tarantella as it gets underway. When the rag flavor comes to the fore, we find that the composer is completely at home in the imported pop idiom. The images are almost Chaplin-esque, and the variety of musical action rather cinematic. Suddenly the form seems more bumptious materials.

ANDANTINO. Winds offer a wistful transition to the Andantino, which alternates the genteel artifice of an 18th-century fête galante with more bumptious materials.

FINALE. The Finale is a breathless Presto, joyous and comic. Even a non-dancer will easily relate these musical images to body movement.

Instrumentation: 2 flutes, piccolo, 2 oboes, English horn, 2 clarinets, bass clarinet, 3 bassoons (1 doubling contrabassoon), 4 horns, 3 trumpets, 3 trombones, tuba, timpani, snare drum, military drum, bass drum, cymbals, tambourine, triangle, glockenspiel, harp, celesta and strings.

PROGRAM NOTE BY MARY ANN FELDMAN.
The opera’s New York debut was less fruitful, and Three Oranges went into hiding until it was revived in 1949 by the City Center Opera Company in New York. In 1923, however, Prokofiev prepared the six-movement suite heard in these concerts, which was premiered in Paris on November 29, 1925. The music is full of the acerbic harmonies, droll tunes, rhythmic angularity, grotesque sounds and satirical twists characteristic of Prokofiev’s early style.

THE MUSIC: AN IMAGINATIVE SUITE

The suite opens with The Ridiculous People, depicting one of the oddball groups who in the opera serve as an onstage audience. They attempt to make the Prince laugh; they also argue, comment on and even try to interfere with the story.

The second movement brings a Game of Cards between the sorceress Fata Morgana and the magician Celio, with power hanging in the balance. The sorceress wins.

Next comes the well-known March, to which the court jester Truffaldino enters with the morose Prince. (Some listeners may recognize it as the theme music to an old radio show, The FBI in Peace and War.) During the Scherzo, scurrying strings suggest the fleet progress of the Prince and Truffaldino in search of the three oranges.

The Prince and the Princess embodies the tenderly romantic love duet, with the vocal lines given over to instruments in the orchestra. This music occurs just after the prince liberates the third dehydrated princess from her orange tomb. Finally, The Flight portrays the chaotic shuffling about as Fata Morgana and her minions attempt to escape retribution.

Instrumentation: 2 flutes, piccolo, 2 oboes, English horn, 2 clarinets, bass clarinet, 3 bassoons (1 doubling contrabassoon), 4 horns, 3 trumpets, 3 trombones, tuba, timpani, snare drum, bass drum, cymbals, suspended cymbal, tambourine, tamtam, triangle, xylophone, glockenspiel, 2 harps and strings
