2. Writing Your Resume

Show Us What You've Done

Your resume gives the hiring team a snapshot of your experience, skills, and accomplishments—even when you're already part of Wyld.

Keep it simple. Include your current and previous roles, dates of employment, and a few bullets highlighting your most relevant responsibilities and accomplishments.

Focus on your impact. Whenever possible, go beyond listing what you were responsible for and tell us what you accomplished.

> Instead of writing: "Responsible for training new employees."
> Try: "Trained and supported new team members through onboarding, helping them become confident in daily processes and procedures."

Highlight transferable skills. Applying to a different team? Think about the skills you've developed that can travel with you—leadership, communication, organization, problem-solving, customer service, training, project coordination, or technical knowledge.

Tailor it to the role. You don't need to completely rewrite your resume for every opportunity. Focus on highlighting the experience most relevant to the position you're applying for.
