

economic development vision, announced in July, “focuses on creating more economic opportunities for our families, our local businesses, and our homegrown entrepreneurs.” His approach includes an annual service campaign called the One ABQ Challenge that this year focuses on connecting youth and the elderly. He recognized Bosque Heating and Cooling for their efforts to assist a 92-year-old woman unable to afford a pipe repair.

Bosque is a type of riparian forest along river floodplains, and is associated with a number of hiking areas in New Mexico, (including a cottonwood park right in the city) as well as Bosque Brewing Co., an ABQ outfit that just refurbished the classic Jackalope building in Bernalillo County in order to expand to a second location.

Trevisani’s fellow USL team owners all have New Mexico roots or have raised their families there. They include Sandia Holdings Founding Partner Ian McKinnon from Connecticut; Ed Garcia, executive chairman of the Garcia

Family of Companies (which has gone from car dealerships to opening a new Taos Lightning whiskey distillery in downtown ABQ); Ben Spencer, CEO of Titan Development; and Jason Harrington, CEO of HB Construction.

If you visit HB’s headquarters in the city, you’ll come full circle from business back to art, because there you will find, on a huge scale across the entire length of the building, a mural entitled “Reach” from artist Mark Horst.

“I was painting while some of his crew was building out their offices,” Horst tells me, “and the work they did was beautiful — exposing old headers and grinding old concrete to look like fine terrazzo. [HB CFO] Adam Harrington was extremely generous and helpful — a great guy. “Working with HB was a treat for me,” Horst says. “The whole organization is professional, yet human.”

Greater Albuquerque, it seems, allows you to be many things at once. — Adam Bruns, Managing Editor, Site Selection
