An Interesting and Educational Day in Cambridge

Our class, Futura, travelled to the UK to visit a variety of places. Although the main goal of the trip was to explore Cambridge, we also had a very important exam coming up—and that’s exactly what this testimonial is about.

After catching two trains—first from Brentwood (where our hotel was located) to London, and then from London to Cambridge—we took a short walk from the train station to our final destination: the inner city. We strolled through the tourist-filled streets, which I found quite fascinating on their own. Of course, we couldn’t possibly uncover all the secrets hidden in Cambridge’s rich history by ourselves, so we had a tour guide take us around. I must say, his explanations were incredibly detailed. I was stunned and amazed by the amount of information he shared, and I don’t think I was the only one—our teachers seemed equally impressed.

All of us were a bit nervous, as the Cambridge Exam was approaching. However, being in the city itself—surrounded by its prestigious colleges and academic atmosphere—gave us a strong sense of motivation to study harder and do our best. Although we were only in the UK for a few days, the experience definitely helped us. Listening to native speakers interact in English naturally improves your pronunciation and expands your vocabulary. I believe schools should incorporate trips like this into their yearly schedule—especially when an important exam is coming up.
